THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA.

THE ORIGIN OF THE RUSSIAN STATE AND NATION—THE TARTAR-MONGOLS—PRINCIPALITY OF MOSCOW
—THE UNITY OF RUSSIA—ISOLATION—THE AIM OF RUSSIAN DIPLOMACY.

WE fail to discover, however far back we go towards the beginnings of the Russian State, any indication that this was ever destined to become a maritime power. In the ninth century, the Slavic tribes that were to form the first political organization designated by the name Russian,—the Slavo-Russian tribes,—occupied a territory securely shut in on the west, by the Poles and the Lithuanians; on the north, by the Finnish tribes, the Livonians, the Tchudis, and the Ingrians; on the east, Finnish tribes again, the Vesi, the Merians, the Muromians, and two Turkish tribes, the Meshtcheraks and the Khazars, that occupied all the northern coast of the Black Sea; allowing but a single one of the Slavo-Russian peoples to hold a position upon its shores. Except at this point, these Slavo-Russian tribes nowhere had access to the coast. The shores of the White Sea and the Arctic Ocean were Finnish; those of the Baltic, Finnish or Scandinavian; those of the Black Sea were held by the Khazars, the Caucasian tribes, the Byzantine Empire, and the Bulgarians, a Finnish tribe that had imposed its name and sovereignty upon a certain number of Slavic tribes.

In the East and North, the Slavs were not to be found even in those regions where afterwards rose the Russian capitals, Moscow and St. Petersburg. Beyond began those immense spaces that stretch away into the depths of Central Asia, and even to the Pacific Ocean, spaces peopled with Finnish and Turkish tribes, and other branches of the Uralo-Altaic family. Then, still further east, were to be found certain peoples of the yellow race.

To speak now only of the Russia of Europe, how did the Slavo-Russians, who in the ninth century held scarcely a fifth part of their present territory, succeed in securing possession of it all? A two-fold change came about during the centuries. On the one hand, the Slavo-Russians, very venturesome in disposition, following, at first, the course of the rivers and their tributaries, spread out over the vast plains that stretch away to the Ural Mountains; founding everywhere cities, villages, and markets right in the midst of the territory of the aboriginal tribes. On the other hand, they absorbed the greater part of those tribes, and imposed upon them their language, religion, and even their manners and customs. A double colonization, therefore, took place, a colonization of the soil and a colonization of the native. The ancient Uralo-Altaic tribes, subjugated or absorbed by the Russians, has disappeared from the map of the empire. There persist still only some scattered remnants of them, surrounded by men of Russian race and speech, and destined soon to disappear. These aborigines are to be found in fairly compact groups only in those places where the severity of the climate, the barren character of the soil, the thickness of the forest, and the desert steppes check Russian civilization, an ethnographical medley, moreover, occupying only a very small and indifferently valuable part of the European Russia of to-day.¹

Thus the primitive tribes of the Slavo-Russians formed an agglomeration which was everywhere well-nigh entirely shut off from any sea. This had a character essentially continental, the population was wholly agricultural in character, and, except as fleets of light boats descended the Dnieper in the tenth century to harass Constantinople and to commit piracy on the Byzantine shores of the Black Sea, there was nothing to indicate that it would one day come forth as a maritime power.

The Russia of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries was scarcely European. She was bound to Europe only by her form of religion, and even that, borrowed from Byzantine, was an Oriental, an almost Asiatic form of Christianity. When there came about in the eleventh century the rupture between the Latin and Catholic Church of the West, and the Greek and Orthodox Church of the East, a still higher barrier was raised between the two parts of Europe. To the Western Christians, the Greeks and the peoples that they had evangelized, the Bulgarians, the Servians, the Moldavo-Wallachians, and the Russians, were only schismatics.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA

Now, while the Catholic peoples of the West, thanks to more favorable historical circumstances, began to take shape as powerful nations in which an already well-advanced civilization went on developing, the schismatic peoples of Eastern Europe, assailed by successive invasions, from Asia, and after having long served as a living bulwark against barbarism for ungrateful Europe, were checked in their historic evolution, and fell one after the other into servitude to pagan Mongols or Mohammedan Turks.

The country where the Slavo-Russians first established themselves was only a prolongation of the great plains which, scarcely broken by the Ural Mountains, extend to Behring's Sea, Okhotsk Sea, and the Sea of Japan. Geographically, topographically, this primitive Russia was already Asiatic. Just as the winds from Asia swept unhindered all this immense plain, so could the migration of peoples and invading expeditions, at times originating near the Great Wall of China, pour unchecked over the Russian plains as far as the Carpathian Mountains and the Vistula.

One of those revolutions, so frequent among the nomadic tribes of Asia, brought together from 1154 to 1227 under the blue banner of Temuchin, called Jenghis Khan, numerous tribes of shepherds and mounted nomads. They adopted as their collective name that of the Tartar-Mongols. At their head "the Inflexible Emperor," "the Son of Heaven," conquered Manchuria, the kingdom of Tangut, North China, Turkestan, and Great Bokhara, and founded an empire which extended from the Pacific to the Ural Mountains. Under the successors of Jenghis Khan, these mounted hordes, maddened by the fury of war and conquest, crossed into Europe, fell upon Russia, then divided into numerous principalities, carried the capital cities by assault, annihilated, one after the other, the armies of foot and horse sent against them, and in 1240 converted all Russia into a mere province of the Mongol Empire. The Russian princes and the chieftains of the Finnish tribes became vassals of the Great Khan,¹ who held his court on the banks of the Onon, an affluent of the Amur, or at Karakorum on the Orkhon, a stream emptying into Lake Baikal. They were also more directly the vassals of one of his vassals, the Khan of the Golden Horde, who was stationed at Sarai on the lower Volga.

At this period the Tartar-Mongols, among whom Mohammedanism was disseminated until about 1272, were still Buddhists, Sham-anists, or fetich worshippers; at heart very indifferent in matters of religion, and strangers to any thought of propagandism or of intolerance. They, therefore, left the Russians in undisturbed possession of their religion, their laws, and their own princely dynasties. They merely exacted tribute, and, in certain contingencies, military service; and every new Russian prince must go to receive his investiture either at Sarai, or even by a journey that would occupy years, at the court of the Great Khan. There they were compelled to prostrate themselves at the foot of his throne, to defend themselves against the accusations of enemies, or of their Russian rivals; and the Khan disposed of their heads as of their crowns. Many Russian princes were executed before his eyes. Some among these, the Russian Church honors as martyrs.

Among the Russian princes who went there to prostrate themselves before the Horde were those who had founded round about a little market-town, the name of which is met with for the first time in 1147, a new principality, that of Moscow, one of the most insignificant of the Russian states of that period. It was established in the midst of a Finnish country, among the Muromians. It formed, therefore, a colony of primitive Russia. The princes of Moscow knew how to turn to their own advantage the Mongol yoke that weighed on all Russia. They were more adroit than the others in flattering the common master and the agents that represented him in Russia. One of them, George (1303-1325), even married a Tartar princess. In their struggles against other Russian princes, they always carried the controversy to the court of the Khan, who almost always decided in their favor, and sent them away with the heads of their rivals. They secured from the Khan the privilege of collecting the tribute, not only from their own subjects, but from the other princes of Russia. This function as tribute collector for the Khan raised them above all their equals; and the more humble vassals of the barbarians they showed themselves to be, the better did they establish their suzerainty over the other Christian states. They succeeded thus in building up a powerful state, which was called the "Great Principality" of Moscow. When they felt themselves to be strong enough, and perceived that the Mongol Empire had grown sufficiently weak through internal dissension and divisions to warrant the attempt, they turned against the barbarians the power that they owed to them. In 1380, the Grand Prince Dmitri, having refused payment of tribute, defeated Mamai, the Khan of the Golden Horde, at Kulikovo on the Don. But the Mongols were not yet as weak as Dmitri Donskoi (hero of the Don) had thought. Tamerlane, or Timur-Leng, had just conquered Turkestan, Persia, Asia Minor, and North Hindustan. One of his lieutenants, Tokhtamysh, having vainly summoned the Grand Prince, Dmitri, to appear before him, marched against Moscow, captured the city and its Kremlin, sacked the other cities of the principality, and everywhere reëstablished Asiatic supremacy. Nevertheless, the Mongol yoke was not to survive long the heroic effort made at Kulikovo. The great barbarian empires founded by Asiatic conquerors quickly fall to pieces. This historical law was verified in the Empire of Tamerlane, as in that of Jenghis Khan. Towards the end of the fifteenth century, the Mongol Empire of Asia was divided in the Mongol Empire of China, the Mongol Empire of India, the Mongol Kingdom of Persia, and a large number of khanates in Turkestan and Siberia; and all those states were scarcely any longer Mongol save in name. In Russia itself, the Golden Horde was broken up. From its debris were formed the czarate of Kazan on the middle Volga, the khanate, or czarate, of Sarai, or Astrakhan, on the lower Volga, the horde of the Nogaïs, and the khanate of the Crimea. In 1476, Akhmed, the Khan of Sarai, sent a demand for tribute to the Grand Prince of Moscow, Ivan the Great. Ivan put the ambassadors to death. Four years later, the Khan Akhmed marched upon Moscow with a large army. Near the rivers Oka and Ugra he met the army of Ivan the Great; but neither of the adversaries dared force the passage of the two rivers. They remained there several days exchanging insults and darts from the opposite shores. Then a panic simultaneously arose in both armies; the one fleeing in the direction of Moscow, the other in the direction of Sarai. It was in this bloodless, inglorious way that the Mongol power in Russia came to an end.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA

The Mongol yoke had continued two hundred and fifty-six years (1224-1480). It left in Russia traces that were for a long time ineffaceable. Before the Tartar conquest, the power of a Russian prince was founded upon European origins. It recalled the patriarchal authority of the old-time chieftains of the Slav-Russian tribes; the martial authority of the heads of the Scandinavian or Variagian clans, like Rorik and other Variagian chiefs, called into Russia, it is said, by the Slavs; and the authority, at once civil and religious, of the Byzantine-Roman emperors, whom the successors of Rorik, like all the barbarian chieftains of Eastern Europe, liked to take as models. After the Tartar conquest, on the contrary, the Russian princes, and especially the Grand Princes of Moscow, selected as prototypes of their own authority the Khans and Great Khans with their autocratic power,—coarse, irresponsible, Asiatic. From that time forward, they treated their vassals as they themselves had been treated by the Khans. Between the Grand Prince and his vassals, and between these and the peasants, the relations were those of brutal masters and trembling slaves. The sovereign of Moscow did not differ from a Mongol Khan, from a Persian Shah, or from an Osmanli Sultan, save as he professed the orthodox religion. He was a sort of a Christian Grand Turk. When the title of Grand Prince seemed to him unworthy of his increased power, the title that his ambition chose was none of those that the Christian rulers of the West then bore; it was the one which the Khans of Siberia, of Kazan, or of Astrakhan had arrogated; it was the title of Czar, which, of course, has not any etymological connection with that of Cæsar, a fiction invented very much later. Such was the title that the heir of the Grand Princes of Moscow, Ivan the Terrible, solemnly took in 1547. Many other facts attest the predominance of Asiatic influences over the Russia of the sixteenth century. The costumes of the Czar of Moscow and of the other great lords, the princes and boyars, were Asiatic; Asiatic was the servile etiquette of the court; touching with the brow the foot of the throne, and the humble formulas in which the highest personages declared themselves to be slaves; Asiatic was the seclusion of the women in the terem, which was a Russian harem;¹ Asiatic was the equipment of the royal

(¹) However, it is proper to call attention to the fact that the servile character of the court etiquette may also have been borrowed from Byzantium, and that the Russian terem may have had its original in the gynæcium of the Greeks.

THE EXPANSION OF RUSSIA

cavalry with their high saddles and short stirrups; their boots with the toe in the form of an upturned crescent; their armor reminding one of the Chinese and Japanese; their curved swords, their bows and quivers, and their head-dress, which resembled a turban surmounted by an aigrette. All this oriental apparel was to continue in vogue until the time when Peter the Great, with the violent measures of an Asiatic despot, forcibly introduced into Russia the short clothing of the West,—“German dress,” that is, European. With this change in costume, he also brought in the fashion of shaving the face; the holding of social gatherings, which the recluses of the terem were compelled to attend; the etiquette of the Christian courts; the formulary of the German bureaucracy, and the uniforms, equipments, and tactics of the armies of the West

While Russia was still groaning under the Mongol yoke, the Grand Princes of Moscow, utilizing their servitude as an instrument of power, caused the other princes to bow before the terror of the Mongol, and brought about "the consolidation of the Russian territory," that is to say, they founded the unity of Russia. When the family line of the Grand Princes and Czars of Moscow died out in 1598, and when there began for Russia "those troublous times (smoutnoïé Vrémia)," which the accession of the Romanofs brought to an end in 1613, the czar-ate of Moscow was already a very powerful state.

In the North especially, by the annexation of the territories of the ancient republics of Novgorod and Pskof, the Muscovite supremacy was extended to the White Sea and the Arctic Ocean. On the west, in a series of wars against the Lithuanians and the Poles to "recover" from them Russian territory which they had formerly conquered, the Moscow czarate had carried its power beyond Pskof and Lake Peïpus, and had reached the Dnieper at Kiev and Smolensk. In the South, it had reached neither the Black Sea nor the Sea of Azov, from which it was separated by the Ukraine that still belonged to the Poles, by a republic of adventurers and pirates called the Zaporovians, by the khanate of the Crimean Tartars, by the camping-grounds of the Nogaian Tartars, and, finally, by the maritime power of the Ottomans on the Euxine. Eastward, Russian conquest and colonization had made great advances. The uniting of the old territories of Novgorod, and the annexation of those of the republic of Viatka, brought the Muscovite domination to the Ural Mountains. The conquest of the czarate of Kazan by Ivan the Terrible, in 1552, gave him all the region of the middle Volga, and the conquest of the czarate of Astrakhan, two years later, placed in his power all the lower Volga country, with a part of the coast of the Caspian Sea. Finally, the conquest of the khanate of Sibir, between the years 1579-1584, by the Cossack Irmak, carried the Russian eagles beyond the Urals, and opened before them the immensities of Siberia.

But the more extensive the Muscovite Empire became, the more it suffered from not having access to any sea which was all the year free from ice, or which would afford an outlet to the ocean. The Harbors of the White Sea were closed with ice eight months of the year; the Caspian Sea is only a great lake without an outlet. To reach the Baltic Sea, it would be necessary to battle against the Germans, the Poles, and the Swedes, the masters of all its shores. To gain access to the Black Sea, there were, again, the Poles to be fought, as well as the Tartars, the Zaporovians, and the Grand Turk. Now, the European neighbors of Russia were beginning to fear this great barbarian empire. They were convinced that it would become truly a terror to them the day on which, by obtaining regular communication with the West, it could thereby learn something of their civilization, their industries, and, above all, their military art. They understood that the backward condition of its civilization was the only safeguard against its ambitions. They, therefore, closed against it their eastern frontiers, and barred it out of the Baltic. At the time when Ivan the Terrible, profiting by the decadence into which the Sword-Bearers, the religious military order of the Livonians, had fallen, took their lands away from them, and raised his flag at their port of Narva, Poles, Germans, and Swedes united against him; they incited fresh invasions of the Crimean Tartars, conspiracies and rebellion among his nobility; and, after a bitter struggle of twenty-four years, compelled him to abandon his conquest in 1582. So long as Narva was in the hands of the Czar, Sigismund, King of Poland, did not have a moment's peace. When English merchants began to resort there, he wrote threatening letters to Queen Elizabeth, summoning her to forbid that traffic. "Our fleet will seize all those who continue to sail thither; your merchants will be in danger of losing their liberty, their wives and children, and their lives." And this confession escaped him: "We see by this new traffic the Muscovite, who is not only our enemy to-day, but the hereditary enemy of all free nations, furnishing himself thoroughly, not only with our guns and munitions of war, but, above all, with skilled workmen, who continue to prepare equipments of war for him, such as have been hitherto unknown to his barbaric people. * * * It would seem that we have thus far conquered him because he is ignorant of the art of war and the finesse of diplomacy. Now, if this commerce continues, what will there soon be left for him to learn?"

Thus, it was not merely unpropitious nature that kept Russia in a condition of blockade; but the jealousy of her neighbors mounted a most rigorous guard around these "barbarians" of the North. The empire of Moscow remained condemned, like the agglomeration of Slavic tribes of the ninth and tenth centuries from which it had sprung, to a purely continental life. It was shut up to its vast northern plains like the Swiss to his mountains, and seemed to have as little chance of ever becoming a maritime power.

Hitherto, the Muscovite Empire with its military organization wholly Asiatic, with its noble-born knights and free peasants, with its infantry militia, the streltsy, with its old-fashioned artillery, with its regular troops of Cossacks, Tartars, and Calmucks, had been able to withstand victoriously Asiatic forces; but it could not maintain a struggle against the regular troops and improved weapons of the western nations. In order to make her mark in Europe, it was necessary for Russia to become European; but she could not become European if Europe persisted in holding her in a condition of blockade. It was a "vicious circle"; and it was reserved for the genius of Peter the Great to succeed in breaking that circle.

Henceforth, we see Russian diplomacy, with tireless patience, with a shrewdness equal to its persistency, endeavoring simultaneously in all directions to pierce the blockade. She strives to secure access to the Baltic Sea; and we shall have the Northern War of Peter the Great, the partition of Poland under Catherine II., the Finland question under the Czarina Elizabeth, and under Alexander I. She strives to secure access to the Black Sea; and we shall have the Eastern Question in all its forms, from the first efforts of Peter the Great down to the war of 1877-78 of Alexander II. She strives to make herself mistress of the Caspian Sea, and the attempt made by Peter the Great will reach an end only under Alexander III. She strives to secure access to the Indian Ocean, and we shall have the wars and treaties with Persia, Afghanistan, and England. She strives to secure access to the Okhotsk Sea, the Sea of Japan, and the Pacific Ocean, and we shall witness the work of Siberian colonization and all the phases of the Far Eastern Question. The matter of securing new territory concerns her much less. It has been the supreme end of her efforts, at times continued for centuries, to reach a sea,—a sea free from ice, a sea opening into the ocean.

WE know with what energy and alternation of success and failure Peter the Great struggled against the Swedish masters of the eastern and southern shores of the Baltic. We are amazed when we reflect that a war, lasting more than twenty-one years; a war that convulsed all Europe; that brought the Swedes into the heart of Russia and the Russians into the centre of Germany; that brought about the creation of a Russian army and navy under the fire of the enemy, and that numbered a score of battles on land and sea,—should have ended in results apparently so meagre as were those gained by Russia in 1721 at the Treaty of Nystad; namely, the acquisition of four small provinces, Livonia, Esthonia, Ingria, and Karelia. But these provinces gave him on the Baltic the ports of Riga, Revel, and Narva; they gave him also the mouths of two rivers, the broad Neva and the Dūna, or Dvina (not to be confounded with the other Dvina that empties into the White Sea). It was on the islets of the Neva that Peter the Great had founded, in 1703, on lands still disputed by the Swedes and by the floods, the capital of European Russia, St. Petersburg, protected on the west by the maritime fortress of Kronstadt. Yes, "the Giant Czar" considered himself amply repaid for his efforts of twenty-one years by the fact that for his vast continental empire, still wrapped in Asiatic darkness, he had been able "to open one window on Europe."

This window was still a very narrow one. It was somewhat enlarged by Elizabeth, when, after a war foolishly undertaken by Sweden, she made that country, in the Treaty of Abo, 1743, surrender some districts in Finland. Later, Alexander I., during his short-lived alliance with Napoleon, conquered from his recent ally, Gustavus III., all of Finland (Treaty of Fredericksham, 1809). Russia had now no longer anything to seek in that direction.

Westward, between Russia, already powerful and always war-like, and Prussia, now grown great in glory and strength, lay an extremely weak state made up of the kingdom of Poland, the grand duchy of Lithuania and some old-time Russian districts. The first three partitions of this state (1772, 1793, 1795), carried the Russian frontier to the Niemen, the Warthe, and the Dniester. Catherine II. completed these conquests by the annexation of Courland, which had been a vassal dependency of the fallen kingdom. It is to be noted, however, that in what is called "the partition of Poland," Catherine II. did not acquire any Polish, but merely Lithuanian territory that formerly had been Russian. If Napoleon I. had not attempted to reëstablish on the Russian frontier a Polish kingdom under the name of "the grand duchy of Warsaw," perhaps Russia would not have been ambitious to secure possession of any former Polish territory. After the fall of Napoleon, the Czar Alexander I. was obliged to appropriate a considerable part of this under the name of "the kingdom of Poland," were it for no other reason than to prevent an increase of territory upon the part of the two German powers. Henceforth the western frontier of Russia was fixed. It has not changed since 1815, and, to admit the possibility of a change in the future, it would be necessary to admit the possibility of a total overturning of the European balance of power.

Though Russian expansion towards the north was stopped by the icy solitudes of Lap-

RUSSIA IN EUROPE

land, westward by the frontiers of states as firmly established as the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires, yet for a long time a broad way remained open to Russia in the direction of the south. The decadence of the Ottoman Empire seemed to offer her the same favorable opportunities as did the decline of the Polish-Lithuanian Empire. In this direction, acquisition of territory promised to be infinitely more precious. The Russians could dream of the Black Sea, the Propontis, and the Ægean Sea becoming Russian lakes; of Christian peoples of the same religion (Roumanians and Greeks),—and of some of the same religion and race (Bulgarians, Servians, Croatians, Bosnians, Herzegovinians, and Montenegrins),—welcoming the armies of a Liberator Czar, and joyfully accepting the domination of Russia in exchange for that of the Ottoman; and, finally, they could dream of Constantinople, the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire, freed from the yoke of the infidel, and of the cross taking the place of the crescent on the dome of Saint Sophia. Nevertheless, it was, perhaps, in the direction of the south, that Russia, in her schemes for expansion, after some brilliant successes, found herself the most completely deceived.

For a long time the sovereigns that sat upon Russia's throne at Moscow, and then at St. Petersburg, were infatuated with this Oriental mirage. The Russian Orthodox Church urged them on in this course through sympathy with the Orthodox Christians who were in subjection to the infidel. Even the Roman Catholic Church at a certain time encouraged them in the hope that the sword of the Czar might accomplish both the deliverance of the Christians and the union of the two churches, that is to say, the subordination of the Greek Church to the Roman. It was Pope Paul III., who, at the advice of the Greek cardinal, Bessarion, offered to the Grand Prince of Moscow, Ivan the Great, the hand of his ward, Sophia Palæologus, the niece of the last Christian emperor of Constantinople. It was at Rome that the marriage took place, and it was the Pope who gave a dowry to the heiress of the Cæsars of the East.¹ It is from the time of this marriage that the double-headed eagle of the Palæologus took its place on the escutcheons and standards of the Russian sovereigns. Paul III. was deceived in both his hopes; for the union of the two churches was never accepted at Moscow, and many years passed before a Russian army was able to advance a step southward. The second of the Romanofs, Alexis, father of Peter the Great, set the first landmark southward in the Treaty of Andrussovo with Poland, in 1667, by acquiring a part of the Ukraine, extending as far as the upper course of the Dnieper. Vast spaces still separated the Russian and the Ottoman Empires. Nevertheless, in the coolest and shrewdest minds brooded the idea of a holy war against the infidel. Peter the Great, still young and journeying in Western Europe, learning its arts and himself wielding the carpenter's axe at Saardam, wrote, in 1697, to Adrian, the Patriarch of Moscow: "We are laboring in order thoroughly to conquer the art of the sea, so that having completely learned it, on our return to Russia, we may be victorious over the enemies of Christ, and by His grace be the liberator of the down-trodden Christians. This is what I shall never cease to desire until my latest breath."

Upon his return to Russia, however, his struggle with Sweden occupied all his attention. It was only in 1711, when his enemy, Charles XII., a refugee in the domains of the Grand Turk, earnestly sought to have the latter take up arms against Russia, that Peter the Great allowed himself to be tempted by the appeal which the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia, Montenegrin envoys, and Greek agents addressed to him in the name of Christians who were oppressed and ready to rise in revolt. He found immense spaces to be traversed; and crossed the Pruth with only thirty-eight thousand starving and harassed soldiers. He discovered that all the promises of the Levantines were unwarranted; he met neither allies nor help; and beset by two hundred thousand Turks, or Tartars, he had to consider himself fortunate to get back again across the rivers, after having signed the Treaty of Falksen, or of the Pruth, which restored to the Ottomans his first conquest, the city of Azov.

The second southward step of the Russians was the conquest of a bit of territory that was peopled with Servian colonists, and that was called New Servia. This acquisition was won by the Treaty of Belgrade in 1739; but it had cost the Empress Anna Ivanovna three years of war and useless victories, and nearly one hundred thousand men.

The third was a gigantic step. After the first war against the Turks, Catherine II. found herself checked by the intervention of Prussia and Austria, who compelled her to renounce nearly all her eastern conquests, and to accept a compensation in Poland. Nevertheless, by the treaty of Kaïrnaji, in 1774, she had ceded to her Azov on the Don, and Kinburn at the mouth of the Dnieper. She forced the Sultan to recognize the independence of the Tartars of the Bug, of the Crimea, and of the Kuban. This was to prepare for their annexation to Russia, which was successfully accomplished and sanctioned by the Constantinople Compact of 1784. All the north shore of the Black Sea and of the Dniester, as far as the Kuban River, now became Russian. The last Mohammedan states of Russia were converted into provinces of the empire, and the last vestige of "the Tartar yoke" was effaced from Russian soil.

At once in the Tauric peninsula and at the mouths of the rivers arose formidable fortresses, Kherson, Kinburn, and, on a bay of the Crimea, Sevastopol was made ready to control the Black Sea. An entire Russian fleet was built up, which could in two days cast anchor before the walls of the Seraglio. The conquest of the Turkish Empire, impossible to Peter the Great, seemed to become easy for Catherine the Great. In the triumphant journey that she next accomplished through the conquered provinces, her route was crowded with triumphal arches, bearing this inscription: "The way to Byzantium." She herself provoked the second Turkish war (1787-1792). The Russian armies, everywhere victorious, advanced to the Danube. The janissaries and spahis of the Sultan could not stop them in their course. But again did European diplomacy intervene. Catherine II. had to give up the Roumanian hospodarates, which had been entirely subdued, and be satisfied with Otchakov, and a strip of territory between the Bug and the Dniester, and with guarantees more explicit than those of 1774 in favor of the Roumanian principalities. This arrangement, accomplished at the Treaty of Yassy, 1792, established over these principalities a sort of distant Russian protectorate. Thus, although four Russian interventions had already occurred, not an inch of Christian territory had been wrested from the Sultan, and not a Christian tribe had been delivered from his yoke.

The fifth intervention took place under Alexander I. So long as his alliance, made at Tilsit in 1807, with Napoleon continued, his armies were victorious. The Roumanians were again conquered as far as the Danube; Bulgaria, conquered as far as the Balkans; and under George the Black (Kara-Georges), Servia won her independence with her own forces alone. The rupture with Napoleon compelled the Czar to sign the peace of Bucharest with the Sultan in 1812. Of all his conquests, he retained only a bit of Roumanian territory, Bessarabia between the Dniester and the Pruth,—as also Ismail and Kilia on the lower Danube. The Roumanians and Bulgarians fell again under the Ottoman yoke, and Servia was abandoned to herself. Nevertheless, an amnesty was stipulated in favor of the Servians, and guarantees were given in favor of the Roumanians. In 1827, Nicholas I., by the Akerman Agreement, which was an explanation of the Treaty of Bucharest, caused the guarantees accorded the Roumanians to be clearly defined. As for the Servians, crushed for a time by Ottoman retaliation, they had taken up arms under Milosh Obré-novitch, and, thanks to European intervention, they obtained, with certain restrictions, their autonomy.

The sixth intervention of Russia occurred on the occasion of the Greek revolution. On July 8, 1827, Russia, France, and England entered into concerted action by the Treaty of London. The united fleets of the three powers annihilated the Turkish and Egyptian fleets at Navarino (October 20). While a French army was operating in the Morea to insure Greek independence, Nicholas I. took it upon himself to settle the rest of the Eastern Question. His European army again conquered the Roumanians and Bulgarians, invaded Thrace, and entered Adrianople. In Asia, his forces occupied Turkish Caucasia. The Treaty of Adrianople, concluded in 1829, guaranteed the autonomy of Moldavia, of Wallachia, and of Servia, and consummated the independence of Greece, which was formed into a kingdom. Thus were the hopes that Peter the Great had entertained respecting the Christians of the East partially realized; but Russia did not secure any territory in Europe except the isles of the Danubian delta; reserving for herself freedom of navigation in the Black Sea, and an open way through the straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles.

RUSSIA IN EUROPE

Only in Asia did she secure a territorial indemnity.

The second eastern war, undertaken by Nicholas I., and which began like the others by the conquest of the Roumanians, brought about the intervention of France and England in the Crimea, which caused the Czar Nicholas to die of grief, and which ended in the Treaty of Paris (March 30, 1856). By this treaty, his successor, Alexander II., had to renounce all the advantages gained in Europe by the Treaty of Adrianople; to give back the delta of the Danube; to consent to limiting of his military power in the Black Sea; and to abdicate his exclusive right of protection over the Danubian principalities, which were henceforth placed under the collective protectorate of the great powers.

When France found herself engaged in a bloody duel with the German Empire, Russia profited by the occasion to have a conference called at London in March, 1871, by which she secured the suppression of article two of the Treaty of Paris, which limited her military power in the Black Sea.

The last and the most decisive Russian intervention was the one provoked in 1877 by the Bulgarian massacres, the Bosnian and Herzegovinian revolution, and the uprising in Servia and in Montenegro. In addition to the help of these different forces, Russia made sure of the armed assistance of the principality of Roumania, that had been formed in 1859, by the union of the two old-time hospodarates of Moldavia and Wallachia. She again made the conquest of Bulgaria and of a part of Thrace. This time, it was in plain sight of Constantinople that the victorious armies of Alexander II. halted. The Sultan had with which to oppose them only twelve thousand men, encamped on the heights of Tchadalcha. It seemed, therefore, to be in the power of the Czar to bring to an end the Ottoman domination in Europe, to proclaim the liberation of all the Christian peoples, and at last to plant the cross on the dome of Saint Sophia. But before the threatening demonstration of England and the disquieting attitude of Austria and Germany, he did not dare to do so. He contented himself with imposing upon the Porte the Treaty of San Stefano (March 3, 1878), which secured for the protégés of Russia an actual dismemberment of European Turkey. Montenegro saw its territory doubled in extent; Servia and Roumania were declared entirely independent. The first received the districts of Nisch, Leskovatz, Mitrowitz, and Novibazar; the second acquired Dobrudscha, but on the condition that it return to Russia the delta of the Danube, which Wallachia had acquired in the treaty of 1856. Bulgaria was to form a vassal principality of Turkey. Her territory extended from the Danube to the Black and Ægean Seas, leaving around Constantinople and Salonica only some fragments of Ottoman territory. In Asia, Russia acquired the fortresses and districts of Batum, Kars, Ardahan, and Bayazid. Moreover, Turkey was to pay a war indemnity of three hundred and ten million rubles.

Thus Russia took, so to speak, nothing for herself in Europe. It was sufficient for her that Roumania, Servia, Montenegro, and Bulgaria were completely liberated and organized. Of course, she hoped that these petty states that owed their very existence to her would be more docile to her influence than to that of the Sultan, less accessible to the hostile influences of the German and English powers; that their ports would be open to her, and that their armies would constitute auxiliary corps of the Russian army.

An early disillusion came to the "Liberator Czar." The relative disinterestedness of which he had given proof at San Stefano did not foresee the jealousy of Austria, fostered as this was by Germany and England. Under threat of a general war, they demanded a revision of that treaty. England would have even desired that the treaty of 1856 should be taken as a basis for discussion, as if she could proceed with the victorious Russia of 1878 as she had done with the Russia of 1856, conquered in the Crimea. The Czar agreed to the calling of a congress in Berlin. The treaty that was signed there July 13, 1878, curtailed Montenegro of half the part assigned her, and forbade her having a navy; took back Novibazar and Mitrowitz from Servia, and was particularly harsh towards Bulgaria; reducing her territory by one-third, and carving the remainder into two provinces: Northern Bulgaria, with the title of "vassal principality," and Southern Bulgaria, under the name of the province of Eastern Roumelia, which continued under Turkish domination, but which was to be administered by a Christian government. Increase of territory was granted to Greece by the addition of a district of Epirus (Arta) and almost all of Thessaly. There was even quibbling over the territory that Russia had retained in Asia. Bayazid was taken from her, and Batum was to be dismantled and to become an open port. What especially irritated the Czar was the fact that the two powers that were thus depriving him of the fruits of his victories found means to slice off a share for themselves. Under the pretext of administering their affairs, Austria secured Bosnia and Herzegovina, and, by a separate treaty, England had given to her by the Sultan the island of Cyprus (30th of May and 4th of June) and a controlling situation in Anatolia.¹

Emperor Alexander II. had run the danger of a European war in order to carry out his programme of "liberation." The danger still remained imminent, so long as he did not accept the provisions of the Berlin Treaty. There threatened to spring up again, at each of the manifold incidents that arose over the task of settling the boundaries of the ceded countries, armed protests, now by Greece, and now by the Albanians, against certain decisions of the powers that were not to their fancy, and intrigues by Austria and England for the purpose of alienating from Russia the sympathies of the nations emancipated by her victories. In addition to this, the Panslavic agitation, which had been sufficiently strong in Russia to lead the government to run those risks in the East, did not subside. The most impetuous minds found cause of grievance against the Czar, that he had not carried out his undertaking to the end, and had his victorious regiments enter Stamboul, at the peril of a conflict with the English in the very streets of that capital. The Liberals made a pretext of the constitutions granted the Roumanians, the Servians, and the Bulgarians, to demand a constitution for Russia. The Panslavist and Liberal agitation had, perhaps, some connection with the rise of another agitation which soon made its appearance, an agitation called Nihilism, of a character entirely revolutionary and subversive, and which fitly terminated on that tragic day of March 13, 1881, when the "Liberator Czar" became the "Martyr Czar."

For his successor, Alexander III., the results of the eastern war were preparing another series of disillusion. The only fruit that Russia could still expect from her sacrifices and her victories was the strengthening of her influence over the Christian peoples emancipated by her,—and their eternal gratitude. Now immediately after this war the most short-sighted Russian statesmen were constrained to confess that the success of their arms had just created on that "Way to Byzantium," which Catherine II. had so thickly strewn with premature triumphal arches, obstacles more insurmountable than those which the armies of the Sultan had ever been able to oppose to the armies of Alexander I. or of Nicholas I.,—more insurmountable than the Danube or the Balkans, formerly bristling with the fortresses of the Ottomans. These new obstacles consisted in the existence itself of the emancipated nations, and their attachment to their newly found freedom. Thus it was that France, after she had emancipated Belgium under Louis-Philippe and Italy under Napoleon III., found that she had raised upon her northern and southeastern frontiers barriers far more impregnable than the armies or fortresses of Austria; that she had closed forever against herself those Belgian and Lombard battlefields over which her ensigns of victory had so often floated. In the formation of an Italian kingdom, France created the chief obstacle in the way of her own expansion on the shores of the Mediterranean.

The French have naturally and repeatedly denounced the ingratitude of Italy; nor can the Russians be blamed for their grief over the ingratitude of the Roumanians, the Servians, the Bulgarians, and the Greeks. But such is human nature! The feeling of independence and of national pride among newly born peoples will always outweigh the feeling of gratitude towards their liberators. In this respect there was no difference between the peoples joined to the Russians merely by religion, like the Roumanians and the Greeks, and those who were related to them both by religion and race, like the Bulgarians and the Servians. In former times, when the Ottoman yoke rested upon them with its frightful burden, assuredly they would all have joyfully accepted the lordship of the Czar in exchange for that of the Sultan; but now, when it was a question of choosing between the domination of the Czar and their own independence, there could be no hesitation with any of them.

The Russias had done much for the Roumanians. Even when they had been unsuccessful in wresting their territory from Turkey, they had in the treaties of Kaïrnaji, Yassy, Bucharest, Akerman, and Adrianople, stipulated precious guarantees for their protégés and then, later, secured for them an almost complete autonomy. In concert with France, in 1861, they had made the Sultan accept the union of Moldavia and Wallachia into one province. In 1878, they assured this principality of Roumania its full independence, and, in 1881, they consented to its being organized into a kingdom. But the new King of Roumania, Charles of Hohenzollern, and his new subjects meant to remain independent of every other power, to have their own army and navy, their own national policy and diplomacy, and to exercise the right, whenever their liberators showed themselves in the slightest degree meddlesome, to seek help even from Russia's rivals, Austria, Germany, and England, or, even more than this, from their old-time oppressor, the Sultan of Constantinople. More than once, the Roumanians raised complaint against Russia, because, in 1812, she had annexed the little Roumanian district of Bessarabia, and because, in 1878, she compelled

It was the same with the principality of Servia, also made into a kingdom in 1882, and which, according to the needs of its national or dynastic policy, did not cease to oscillate between Russian and Austro-German influences. It was the same also with the kingdom of Greece, which paid no heed to the remonstrances of Russia, when her national ambition was involved, and which had no scruples in troubling the peace of the East every time that it was possible for her to raise the question of uniting to the Hellenic state either Epirus or Northern Thessaly or Macedonia or Crete.

The country that was under the greatest obligation to Russia was Bulgaria. If France or England had at times assisted in the liberation of the Roumanians, the Servians, and the Greeks, it was to Russia alone that the Bulgarians were indebted for this deliverance. Immediately after the "Bulgarian atrocities" of 1875, Russia had hastened to her help. From the condition of simple raïas oppressed by Turkey and cruelly treated by the Tcherkesses and the Bashi-Bazouks, she had caused them to be instantly raised to the dignity of a free people. At San Stefano, she had endeavored to unite them into one state, the most powerful of the Balkan peninsula; which would have extended from the Danube to the Black and Ægean Seas; and she accepted only with deepest reluctance the mutilation and dismemberment that the Treaty of Berlin imposed upon "Great Bulgaria." She gave the restricted principality of Bulgaria at least a constitution when she herself had none. It was the Russian commissioner in Bulgaria, Prince Dondukof-Korsakof, who, on February 23, 1879, convoked at Tirnovo the first "constituency assembly"; it was he who presided at the meeting of the first "legislative assembly," or Sobranié; it was he who espoused the cause of their prince, Alexander of Battenberg; it was

RUSSIA IN EUROPE

RUSSIA IN EUROPE

he who organized a Bulgarian army of one hundred thousand men supplied with valiant Russian officers, well equipped, well drilled, and provided with excellent artillery. Nevertheless, this people and this prince, who owed everything to Russia, began at once to practice a policy in which the advice of the Czar Alexander III. was no longer heeded. They set out to remove the Russians who had portfolios in their ministry and positions in their army. In spite of the Czar, they brought about the revolution of Philippopolis in September, 1885, which ended in the union of the Bulgarian principality and the Bulgarian province of East Roumelia, but which provoked a bloody war with Servia, jealous at seeing her neighbor's increase of territory. When Alexander of Battenberg had to renounce his throne, in 1887, it was a prince that posed as a client of Austria and of Germany, Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg, whom the Bulgarians called to rule them. With his Prime Minister, Stambulof, he governed,—resolutely set against the influence of Russia; he discriminated against her partisans, and surrounded himself with her adversaries. And, thus, the liberation and the organization of Bulgaria, which the Czar had hoped to be able to direct, have gone on independently of him, and, in certain respects, in opposition to him. Sic vos, non vobis! Alexander III.'s resentment against Bulgaria and her prince was very bitter. The somewhat imperious and meddlesome affection of the early days soon turned into hostility. When Alexander III. died, in 1894, the rupture was complete between the intractable principality and the powerful empire.

Thus all the wars undertaken in Eastern Europe by Russia, from Peter the Great, in 1711, down to Alexander II. in 1877, have ended, except in Asia and on the north coast of the Black Sea, so far as territorial expansion is concerned, in most meagre results. Seven great wars have brought her only a strip of Roumanian territory between the Dneister and the Pruth, and another Roumanian bit of land in the delta of the Danube. Even this last morsel, acquired in 1829 and restored in 1856, was won back in 1877 only at the cost of vehement fault-finding upon the part of the Roumanian people. Russia, whose fleets have twice—at Tchesme in 1770, and at Navarino, in 1827,—annihilated the naval power of Turkey, have never been able to secure even an island in the Ægean Sea.

Thus much for material advantages. As to satisfaction of a moral character, the Russian soldiers have never been able to enter Stamboul, nor to pray in Saint Sophia; and as to gratitude upon the part of the liberated peoples, we have seen what Alexander II. and Alexander III. could never have dreamed of.

Their successor, the present Emperor, Nicholas II., seems to have taken it for granted that in the direction of the Danube, of the Black Sea, and of the Ægean Sea, the destiny of Russia is fixed for a long time to come. In these directions, she has no longer any moral or material advantages to gain, and the age of sentimental undertakings is also at an end. Unless there should come some European overturning, the famous "Eastern Question" will have for Russia only an archæological interest. All that Nicholas II. is doing seems to indicate that this is his conviction. He shows no interest in the party struggles and ministerial crises in the Roumanian and Servian kingdoms; towards the Bulgarians, he shows neither jealous affection nor the irreconcilable rancor of his father. Whenever the Prince and people of Bulgaria have manifested a desire for reconciliation with Russia, he has cordially welcomed them; he sent a representative to the orthodox baptism of the Crown Prince Boris, but apparently without forming any illusions as to what he might expect of his protégés. When the Cretan insurrection occurred, and the war foolishly undertaken by the Greeks against Turkey was declared, he was careful not to assume a leading rôle, something that his three predecessors would not have failed to do. On the contrary, he seemed to sink Russia in the "European Concert," to associate her in all the decisions of the five other great powers, and purely and simply to accept accomplished facts. Also, when the Armenian troubles and massacres took place, he did not attempt to intervene, nor to arrogate to himself, either by land or sea, the rôle of liberator of this other oppressed people. He has rather favored a temporizing policy, and has discouraged the plans formed by the other powers to send European fleets to the very walls of the Seraglio, and to impose by force reforms upon the Sultan Abdul-Hamid. On the other hand, in certain other directions, in that of the Indian Ocean, in that of British India, and in that of the China and Japan Seas, Russia has followed a very formal, a very decided policy. At once very energetic and skillful in this policy, she has, at the same time, acted in entire independence of the "European Concert."

THE SOUTHWARD EXPANSION OF RUSSIA IN ASIA.

AN ASIATIC POWER—WARS AND TREATIES WITH PERSIA—A WAY TO THE INDIAN OCEAN—IN THE CAUCASUS—PARAMOUNT IN PERSIA.

IF the policy of the present Emperor of the Russias seems to be inspired by other principles than those of his predecessors; if this policy has shown itself to be essentially peaceable and disinterested in Europe; if it has shifted its sphere of activity from the West in order to devote all its efforts to Southern and especially to Eastern Asia,—this is, perhaps, due to the impressions made upon the Czar during his extended travels in the years 1890 and 1891, while he was still only the Czarevitch Nicholas. He visited Greece, Egypt, British India, French Indo-China, Japan, and China. Then, disembarking at Vladivostock, a powerful Russian naval station on a bay of the

RUSSIA IN ASIA

Sea of Japan, he returned overland to St. Petersburg, crossing the whole extent of Siberia. The Czarovitch, of course, did not give his impressions a literary form; but one of his travelling companions, Prince Oukhtomski, has published his in two luxurious volumes, magnificently illustrated by the Russian artist, Karazine.¹

The opinions of Prince Oukhtomski seem to reveal a new element in Russian policy. Formerly the Russians were indignant over Prince Bismarck's reported observation that "Russia has nothing to do in the West. Her mission is in Asia; there she represents civilization." Prince Oukhtomski is not far from holding the same opinion as did this envious foe of his country. For a few parcels of territory conquered with such difficulty in the West, what bloody wars has she not endured? Her efforts to obtain access to the sea have been but half successful. The White Sea, blocked with ice; the Baltic, as much Scandinavian and German as Russian, closed to her on the west by the Sound and the Belts; the Black Sea, only yet half Russian, and closed on the southwest by the Bosphorous and the Dardanelles; and the Mediterranean itself, with England holding Gibraltar, Malta, Cyprus, Egypt, and the Suez Canal,—are these seas, so little available, sufficient for the needs of the expansion of the mighty continental empire that Russia is to-day? In Asia, on the contrary, who knows whether by the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, by Afghanistan and the Indus, she is not going to be able to open her way to the Indian Ocean? Who knows whether, already mistress of the Okhotsk Sea, she will not become mistress also of the Sea of Japan and the Yellow Sea, both opening with broad outlets into the immensity of the Pacific? Now, the importance that in ancient times the Mediterranean had for mankind, and which the Atlantic possessed from the fifteenth to the nineteenth century, seems to-day to be shifting to the Pacific Ocean. Of all the nations bordering on this truly universal ocean, the Russian Empire is destined to be one of the most powerful. As to territorial conquests, how are those that Russia won in little Europe, where every square mile cost her a battle, to be compared with those which, with infinitely less sacrifice and effort, she has already won, or can yet win, in Asia? Bismarck spoke in disdain of the mission of Russia in Asia. Prince Oukhtomski speaks of it with pride: "The time has come for the Russians to have some definite idea regarding the heritage that the Jenghis Khans and the Tamerlanes have left us. Asia! we have been part of it at all times; we have lived its life and shared its interests; our geographical position irrevocably destines us to be the head of the rudimentary powers of the East."

RUSSIA IN ASIA

From the thirteenth to the fifteenth century, Russia was a province of the Mongol Empire.

RUSSIA IN ASIA

Everything that constituted that Mongol Empire, however, is perhaps destined to become only a province of Russia. The capital will simply be transferred from Karakorum or from the shores of the Amur to the banks of the Neva. Asiatic in their mixture of races, Asiatic in their history, conquered in the thirteenth century, conquering since the sixteenth, the Russians possess to a higher degree than either the French or the Anglo-Saxons an understanding of things Asiatic. They have all the right that is possible to supplant "those colonies of the Germanic and the Latin races that are taking unwilling Asia under their tutelage." Moreover, the true successor in Asia of the old-time czars or khans of the Finnish race is not the Bogdy-Khan who rules at Peking, but "the White Czar who reigns at St. Petersburg." In one of the pagodas of Canton are to be seen, as Prince Oukhtomski assures us, four colossal figures, called "the kings of the four cardinal points," and Prince Oukhtomski felt confident that it was to "the King of the North" that the people rendered the greatest homage.

Laying aside these dreams of the future, let us see what, up to the present time, has been actually accomplished to bring about their realization. ' The efforts of the Russians throughout their history as an Asiatic power are connected with one or the other of two great movements: her southward expansion towards Persia and British India, and her eastward expansion in the regions bordering on China, Corea, and Japan.

In 1554, during the reign of Ivan the Terrible, the Russians gained a foothold on the Caspian Sea by the conquest of the czarate of Astrakhan and of the lower Volga. Towards the close of his life, Peter the Great waged war on Persia, captured Derbend on the Caspian, and occupied the provinces of Daghestan, Shirvan, Ghilan, and Mazandaran, and the cities of Rasht and Astrabad. The unhealthy character of these regions made them "the cemetery of Russian armies," and the successors of the great Czar had to abandon them. A war undertaken by Catherine II., also in the last years of her reign, ended in the same result, and her son, Paul I., recalled the troops. In the region of the Caucasus, the Russians had gained a foothold, between the years 1774-1784, by the acquisition of the Kuban as far as the Terek, and, strangely enough, it was not on the northern slope of the mountains, but upon the southern that they were to begin the conquest of this Caucasus. In 1783, the King, or Czar, of Georgia, Heraclius, declared himself to be the vassal of Catherine II. in order that he might have her assistance against the Persians and the Ottomans. In 1799, his son, George XII.,¹ formally ceded his state to Paul I., although his son, David, continued to govern until 1803, when the annexation was consummated. This acquisition brought Russia into collision with the Persians and the Ottomans on one hand, and, on another, with the independent tribes of the Caucasus. By the Treaty of Gulistan, in 1813, Persia ceded to Russia Daghestan, Shirvan, and Shusha, and renounced all claims upon Georgia and other territories of the Caucasus. Another war broke out in 1826, which was terminated by the Treaty of Turk-manshai, February 22, 1828, by which Persia surrendered her two Armenian provinces,¹ Nakhitchewan and Erivan. The same year, in the Treaty of Adrianople, Turkey gave over to Russia the fortresses and districts of Anapa, Poti, and Akhalzikh, and all rights (bitterly contested by the inhabitants) over Imeritia, Mingrelia, and Abkhasia. Then began, in the new possessions, the task of pacifying the wild mountaineers of these regions, and also the Tcherkesses, or Circassians, of the northern slope. The Circassians and the Abkhasui, roused to fanaticism by the soldier priest, the Imam Shamyl, held out against the Russians for nearly thirty years. In 1844, Russia had in the Caucasus two hundred thousand soldiers, commanded by her best generals. The capture of Védéni, in 1858, and the surrender of Shamyl, a year later, assured the pacification of the Caucasus. The increase of territory that Russia made at the expense of Turkey, in 1878, by the Treaties of San Stefano and Berlin, included the districts of Kars, Ardahan, and Olty, and the port of Batum, and fixed the boundary line between Turkey and Russia as it has since remained.

Since the Treaty of 1828, Persia under the Shahs, Fet-Aly-Khan, Mohammed, Nasr-ed-Din, and Muzafer-ed-Din, has fallen almost entirely under Russian influence. In 1837-38, the Shah Mohammed, with an army commanded by Russian officers, besieged Herat, defended by Afghans under the leadership of English officers. In 1856, the Shah Nars-ed-Din, at the suggestion of Russia, besieged and captured Herat; but the English compelled him to abandon his prize, by making a descent on the Persian Gulf, where they captured the port of Bushire and the island of Karrack, which they have kept. In 1841, Persia ceded to Russia the Caspian port of Ashurada, near Astrabad; in 1881, Askabad was given to the same power, and, in 1885, Serakhs,—all three places very important strategic points on the eastern frontier. Persia has also agreed to the building of Russian railroads that are to pass through her territory and terminate on the Persian Gulf. The present year, she has negotiated a loan of twenty-two million five hundred thousand rubles through the agency of the "bank of Persia," established under Russian auspices. This loan is payable in seventy-five years, and the interest is secured by all the customs revenues of the kingdom, save those of the Persian Gulf. The Shah has bound himself not to seek further loans of any other European power, and has thereby placed himself financially in the hands of Russia. It is thus that Russia, by her diplomacy, by her banks, and by her railroads, making Persia her political and commercial vassal, has succeeded in furthering her scheme of expansion towards the Persian Gulf and the shores of the Indian Ocean.

RUSSIA IN ASIA

FURTHER CONQUESTS.

EXPANSION TOWARDS INDIA—NAPOLEON—THE CONQUEST OF THE KHANS—IN AFGHANISTAN—THE “KEY OF THE INDIES”—IN TOUCH WITH INDIA—ABYSSINIA—BRITISH OVER-CONFIDENCE.

TOWARDS British India Russian expansion was to seek still other channels. The conquests in the Caucasus, which we have been reviewing, opened the way along the western and southern sides of the Caspian Sea. But for a long time the Russians had been endeavoring to turn the sea from its northern side. In the reign of the Empress Anna Ivanovna, hordes of Kirghiz, whose camping grounds lay to the east of the Ural River, submitted to Russia (1734). Her sway was then extended into Turkestan, that expanse of steppes and oases watered by the Jaxartes (Sir-Daria) and the Oxus (Amu-Daria), that empty into the Aral Sea, a region that is bounded on the west by the Caspian Sea, on the south by

Persia and Afghanistan, on the east by the Chinese Empire, and on the north by Siberia. Here was located ancient Djagatai, the debris of former Mongol Empires.¹

When the Russians saw these vast plains spread out before them, they at first thought

(¹) Subsequently it was broken up into numerous states, the principal ones being the khanate of Khokand, with its chief cities Turkistan, Tashkend, Tchimkend, and Khodjend on the upper Jaxartes, or Sir-Daria; the khanate of Balkh (ancient Bactria), and the khanate of Samarkand, fallen into dependency upon the khanate of Bokhara, on the upper Oxus, or Amu-Daria; the khanate of Khiva on the lower Oxus; and on the Kashgar and Yarkand Rivers emptying into Lake Lob-Nor, and the Ili flowing into Lake Balkash, khanates (Kashgar, Yarkand, and Kuldja) that belonged to China. Outside of the districts inhabited by a settled people are the deserts of sand over which wander nomadic tribes. To the north of the Jaxartes, are the Kirghiz, divided into several hordes, and the Turkomans, or Turkmens, on the east of the Caspian Sea.—Consult Krahmer, Russland in Asien, vol. i.; Transkaspian und seine Eisenbahn, vol. ii.; Mittel-Asien, Leipzig, 1898-99. that they were near British India, and that an entrance to that rich peninsula would be as easy to them as it had been to so many Asiatic conquerors that had gone forth from the steppes of Turkestan or the valleys of Afghanistan. From this conviction was born the first schemes that the Russians entertained for the conquest of Hindustan. Even Peter the Great thought of it. In 1717, he sent against Khiva an expedition under Peter Békovitch that perished on the way. A certain A. M. de Saint Génie proposed a plan for the conquest of Hindustan to Catherine II. in 1791; but the most celebrated of all these projects was the one that Paul I. submitted to Napoleon Bonaparte, then first Consul of the French Republic, whose ally against England he had become. The plan was to place two armies in the field. General Knorring, with the Cossacks of the Don and other Russian troops, was to march by Khiva and Bokhara to the upper Indus, while thirty-five thousand French and thirty-five thousand Russians, that Paul I., inspired by chivalric generosity, proposed placing under the command of Masséna, the conqueror of the Russians at the battle of Zürich, were to unite at Astrabad on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea. Thence they were to make their way by Herat and Kandahar to the upper Indus to join forces with the other army. Then, altogether, French, Russians, Persians, Turcomans, and Afghans, they would pour down into India, proclaiming to the princes and the people of the peninsula the fall of English tyranny and their independence. "All the treasures of India were to be their recompense." The execution of this plan was even begun. The Cossacks of the Don, under their ataman, Orlof-Denissof, were already across the Volga, when the news of the death of Paul I. recalled them to their camps.¹

The visionary character of this scheme has been demonstrated, during the present century, by the difficulties that the Russian armies have had to encounter in winning their way over a very small fraction of the immense journey marked out in 1800. At the cost of enormous effort, the oases of Turkestan, which in the mind of Paul I. were to be simply halting places in the long march, have had to be conquered one by one; one by one, deep valleys and rocky bluffs, defended by war-like tribes, have had to be captured and held. To-day, even with these avenues of approach secured, the goal seems as far off as it did to the optimistic imagination of the Czar Paul I. In 1839, Nicholas I., wishing to punish the Khan of Khiva, who was capturing Russian merchants and pillaging Russian caravans, despatched a body of troops commanded by General Pérovski. The severe winters of the steppes and the deep snow compelled him, when half way to his destination, to return. Nevertheless, the Khan, intimidated by this demonstration, liberated the Russian prisoners (1840), and in 1842 consented to acknowledge the over-lordship of Russia. Two years later, the eastern Kirghiz also submitted. In order to protect these new subjects against the Khan of Khokand it was necessary to wage war with the latter. From 1860 to 1864, the leaders of the Russian troops, Pérovski, Kolpakovski, Vérévkine, Tchernaiëff, captured the fortresses of Ak-Mesjed, Turkestan, Aulié-Ata, Tchimbkend, and finally, Tashkend, a city of one hundred thousand souls, and the commercial emporium of that region.

The Emir of Bokhara attempted to intervene, and had a "holy war" preached by the fanatical Mollahs; but he was conquered in the battle of Irjar (1866), and promised to pay a war indemnity.

However far the Russians might still be from the frontier of India, England was nevertheless disturbed at their success. The official journals of St. Petersburg amused themselves with pacific declarations, announcing that there was no intention of conquering Bokhara; but the Czar organized the territories, already submissive, into "the general government of Turkestan," and General Kaufmann was placed in control. The Emir of Bokhara, having refused to deliver the war indemnity that he had promised, was defeated at Zera-Bulak, and was compelled to sign the treaty of 1868, by which he ceded to the Russians the khanates of Samarkand and Zerafshan; recognized a Russian protectorate, and paid an indemnity of two million rubles. The khanate of Khokand became, likewise, a vassal state.

FURTHER CONQUESTS

The Khan of Khiva continued to pillage caravans, and to hold in slavery Russian merchants. In 1873, three bodies of troops were sent against him; one coming from the shores of the Caspian Sea under General Markozof, the second from Orenburg under General Vérévkine, the third from Tashkend under Governor-General Kaufman. The first, after a difficult march through the burning sands of the desert, was compelled to fall back. The other two entered Khiva almost without striking a blow. The Khan was obliged to acknowledge himself the vassal of "the White Czar," to cede all that part of his territory situated on the right bank of the Oxus, to grant the Russians the rights of navigation and commerce, and to submit to a war indemnity that exhausted his finances. The Khans that had yielded to the Russians were now the objects of the scorn and hatred of the more fanatical among their Mohammedan subjects. These did not cease to rise in revolt against them. The Khan of Khokand preferred to surrender his territories to Russia; and they were formed into the new province of Ferghana, in 1875. The same year, the Khan of Khiva offered to surrender his in exchange for a pension. The Russians did not wish to annex either this khanate or that of Bokhara, less through fear of English protests than because the existence of two vassal Khans would allow them to conceal the better their political plans. They maintain them on their thrones by paying them a pension. To-day, the Khan of Bokhara is captain of a regiment of Terek Cossacks, and the Khan of Khiva is lieutenant-general of the Orenburg Cossacks.

In 1851, the Russians had obtained from China some commercial advantages in the Kuldja province. Twenty years afterwards a Mohammedan adventurer, Yakub-Khan, seized the Chinese khanates of Kashgar and Yarkand, and incited a Mohammedan rebellion in Kuldja. The Russians entered the province, giving China to understand that they would remain there until order was reëstablished (1871). They would gladly have annexed it; but Chinese troops had been despatched; and, after years of marching, they arrived in Kashgar (where Yakub had been assassinated in 1877), and upon the Kuldja frontier. The Russians first thought of resisting the troops and holding the province; but the territory in dispute did not seem worth the risk of a war with China. By the St. Petersburg Treaty of 1881, they gave back Kuldja, except one district on the river Ili, and renounced their military position in Kashgar in exchange for certain commercial advantages.

To complete the conquest of Turkestan, it remained for them to subdue the nomadic Turcomans (Tekke-Turcomans). This was the the object of the brilliant campaigns directed by Skobelev, who carried by assault the fortress of Geok-Tepe on January 24, 1881, with a loss to the enemy of eight thousand men. Then he took Askhabad, which was afterwards ceded by Persia.¹

The agreement with Persia and the conquest of Turkestan brought Russia's power to the frontier of Afghanistan, which the English regard as the protecting wall of their Indian Empire. At every forward movement of the Russians, they protested or endeavored to secure guarantees against a new advance or tried to gain for themselves some new strategic point that would strengthen their position. They were not always successful. After the first siege of Herat by the Persians, in 1840, the English made the conquest of Kabul. Their army was driven out by an insurrection, and totally annihilated while retreating (1841). If, to save their honor, they afterwards recaptured Kabul, prudence led them to abandon it as quickly as possible (1842). After the annexation or subjection of the khanates by the Russians, the English again made their way into Kabul, and left there a resident representative, Cavagnari; but a popular uprising, in 1879, brought about the murder of Cavagnari and eighty-seven of his retinue. The expedition sent to avenge this insult was led by General Roberts,¹ since then Field Marshal Lord Roberts, Commander in Chief of the English Army. This expedition, however, brought about as little definite result as did the former intervention in Afghanistan.

In 1881, the English had gained from the Russians the assurance that they had no intention of annexing the city of Merv, a very important strategic point; but in 1884, the notables of that city presented themselves to the Russian Commander at Askhabad, and made declaration that they accepted the lordship of "the White Czar." The English made complaint to the cabinet at St. Petersburg. They were answered that the action of the people of Merv had been a surprise to the Russians themselves; but that they believed that they would have committed a great mistake by rejecting a submission that was so entirely voluntary. The English had secured the appointment of an Anglo-Russian commission for settling the disputed boundaries, which was to decide whether Penjdeh, another very important point, belonged to their client, the Emir of Afghanistan, or to the Turcoman subjects of Russia. The English commissioners, presided over by General Lumsden, were the first to arrive at the place of meeting. They began by fortifying Herat and inciting the Afghans to seize Penjdeh. Seeing this, the chief Russian commissioner, General Komarof, at the head of a strong Russian force, occupied the Zulfikar Pass, and made ready to march upon Penjdeh. While on the way thither, he was attacked by the Afghans at Kushk. He slew five hundred of their men, captured two of their flags and all their artillery (March 30, 1885). Then the English commissioners withdrew, charging Komarof with having been the aggressor. Great Britain was much irritated. Gladstone, who had the Egyptian Soudan and the Upper Burmah wars on his hands, called upon Parliament for subsidies. The belief was general that a war was about to ensue between "the whale and the elephant." Then England calmed down, and accepted the explanation of the Russians, that the fight at Kushk was the result of a "mistake." In 1885 and 1887, she agreed to the Russian occupation of Merv, Penjdeh, Kushk, and the Zulfikar Pass. The Russians were now within one hundred and twenty kilometres of Herat, known for so long a time as the "key of the Indies."

The question of the settlement of the boundaries was scarcely disposed of, when another question presented itself in the settlement of the boundaries of the Pamirs. These form a plateau of from four to five thousand metres in latitude, known as "the roof of the world," with a rigorous climate and sparse population. This plateau commands both Afghanistan and Cashmere, those two ramparts of India and Chinese Turkestan. It was broken up into petty khanates, over which the Khan of Bokhara, the vassal of the Russians, and the Emir of Afghanistan, the client of the English, laid claim to sovereignty. Neither of them had recognized until then the value of the territory. An "expedition for study," accompanied by six hundred Russian soldiers, made its appearance in Pamir in the summer of 1891, and aroused, by its presence there, the protests of the English. At the approach of winter, the Russians withdrew; but they again appeared the following summer, in larger numbers, under the command of Colonel Yanof. They contended that they were insulted by the Afghans, for which they inflicted upon them the bloody defeat of Somatash (July 12), after which they fell back and took up their position at Kalabery on the Oxus. This clash of arms was succeeded by a diplomatic controversy. It was not until 1895, after a keen discussion between the two great powers, each contending for its own client, that they reached an agreement. The disputed region was divided between Bokhara and Afghanistan, the former receiving the little khanates of Shugnan and Roschan, and the latter the khanate of Wakhan, a narrow strip of territory, from twenty to thirty kilometres wide, which now forms "a buffer state" between the two great empires of Russia and Great Britain. Even after this agreement, Russia found a pretext in 1899 for occupying the district of Sirikul, which belongs to Chinese Pamir, and which commands the source of the Kashgar and Yarkand Rivers (March, 1889).

Great Britain having occupied in Arabia

the island of Perim in the imamate of Muscat, in order to control the outlet of the Red Sea, and to establish a coaling station in her maritime route, Russia, in 1899, also endeavored to obtain from the Imam the grant of a coaling station on his coast. From this arose new complaints and strenuous opposition on the part of England. Russia also established herself, under color of orthodox proselytism, at a point quite as annoying to British interests, on the coast, and at the very capital of Menelik, Emperor of Abyssinia. A first attempt in this direction was made in 1889 by a Russian adventurer, calling himself Achinof, "the free Cossack." He took possession of the dismantled fort of Sugallo on the territory of the French colony of Obock. The former "anounada of Sugallo" drove him away, and the Russian government disavowed his action. The mission of Lieutenant Machkof (1889-1892), and the so-called "scientific mission" of Captain Léontief in 1894, thanks to the ready assistance of the French authorities, succeeded much better. Thus was Russian influence, in close harmony with French influence, established almost upon the British Nile. In 1898, the Russian Colonel, Artamonof, with some Abyssinain troops, endeavored to meet Major Marchand, who was moving upon Fashoda, and to reinforce him on the great river.

The English alternate between doubting and believing that these expansive movements of Russia by way of the Caucasus, by way of Turkestan, and by way of the Pamirs, are all directed towards one goal, the very one that the Czar Paul proposed to the first Consul Bonaparte in 1800; Alexander I. to the Emperor Napoleon (1807); and General Duhamel to Nicholas I. (1855), and the ardent Skobelef to his government. To many intelligent Englishmen, the goal of so much effort can be no other than the conquest of India. Now that the frontier of the Russian Pamir is not more than twenty or thirty kilometres from the kingdom of Cashmere, and now that Kushk, the terminus of the Turkestan railroad system, is only one hundred and twenty kilometres from Herat, the problem of invading India is infinitely more easy than it was in the time of Bonaparte and Paul I. Why have the Russians spent so much money and blood in the conquest of the impoverished and barbarous nations of those sandy deserts and almost inaccessible mountains, if they did not have before them, as a recompense for their sacrifices, what Paul I. called "all the riches of the Indies."

A recent historian of Russian expansion,¹ Alexis Krause, reviewing all the hardships endured by Russia and the thankless task that she has assumed, adds, "On its own account, the conquest of Central Asia is worthless. It is not done in ignorance, but by carefully thought-out design, as part of a programme, the execution of which its possession will assist. The capture of the khanates was attempted, not as a pathway towards the coveted Persian Gulf, but as a road which would lead to the Panjab and all that is beyond. And now that preliminary steps have been completed, the serious undertaking is about to be begun."

James MacGahan, one of the best informed men on Eastern affairs, wrote from the shores of the Oxus in 1876: "The Russians are steadily advancing towards India, and they will, sooner or later, acquire a position in Central Asia which will enable them to threaten it. Should England be engaged in a European war, then, indeed, Russia will probably strike a blow at England's Indian power."

Other Englishmen pretend to believe that the hypothesis of a conquest of India "is too preposterous to be entertained. It would involve the most terrible and lingering war the world has ever seen. On the day that a Russian army leaves Balkh or Herat for Kandahar, well may the British commander exclaim: 'Now hath the Lord delivered them into my hand!' ”

It is thus that Lord Curzon, the present Governor-General of India, expresses himself. It seems, however, that he is but assuming a tone of assured certainty to conceal his deep anxiety. This plan of conquest that he considers “too preposterous to be entertained,” has been discussed by other, and very competent persons, who do not reach conclusions so optimistic as regards Great Britain.¹ Perhaps, however, the Russians are at present pressing so closely towards the frontier of British India in order to have at their disposal a means of intimidation, or even of coercion, for use in those very frequent occasions in which Great Britain sets herself in stubborn opposition to Russia's plans in other parts of the world. THE eastward expansion of Russia through the solitudes of Siberia and among its barbarous tribes began about the close of the sixteenth century, immediately after the conquest of the Tartar czarates of Kazan and Astrakhan. It was between the years 1579 and 1584 that the Cossack, Irmak Timofévitch, fleeing from the punishment of the law and the wrath of the Czar, Ivan the Terrible, with a handful of brigands like himself, Russians, Cossacks, Tartars, German and Polish prisoners of war, to the number of six hundred and fifty men, crossed the Ural, traversed the immense, untrodden forests of the Tobol, defeated the Tartar Khan, Kutchum, took Sibir, his capital, and subjected to tribute the tribes of the Irtysh and the Obi. When Irmak Timofévitch was drowned in the Irtysh, dragged to the bottom of the river by the weight of the cuirass given him by the Czar, Russia made a hero, and the Orthodox Church a saint, of the old outlaw. Along the pathways that he had marked out, there soon followed a stream of "good fellows" of every description, gold-seekers, fur-hunters, and peasants fleeing the estates of their feudal lords in search of government lands that they might cultivate as freemen. Hither also flocked religious dissenters, persecuted by the Orthodox Church, who found a shelter in the immensity of the Siberian forest, retreats concealed from all mankind. Into this same wilderness escaped the German, Polish, and Swedish prisoners of war of Peter I.

RUSSIA IN THE FAR EAST

and of Catherine II. Then, in long, wretched troops came in chains or in fetters the unhappy serfs deported by their masters, often bearing the marks of cruel beating and mutilation; their sides scarred by the knout, and nostrils or tongue cut by the executioner; strewing the highways with their corpses. This barbarous feature of the old Russian penal code came to an end at the close of the last century, and it is known that the present Czar, Nicholas II., has suppressed deportation into Siberia for common law crimes in order to purify that colony of a reproach like to that against which the English colonies of Australia long protested. The rapidity with which colonization of every kind was spread over the millions of kilometers which the immensity of Siberia measures, is shown by the dates of the founding of the principal towns: Tobolsk on the Tobol in 1587; Tomsk on the Toms, a branch of the Obi, in 1604; Yeniseisk on the Yenisei in 1619; Yakoutsk in 1632; Atchinsk in 1642; Nertchinsk on the Shilka, a branch of the Amur, in 1654; Okhotsk on the sea of the same name in 1638.

Siberia, even to our own times, has been valuable mainly on account of its immense extent and the liberty that free immigrants have found there. It may be divided into three divisions: in the north, the toundra, marshy in summer, a mass of ice in winter; in the centre, the taïga, or forest, dear to the hunter; in the south, the cultivated region, of an area thrice that of all France. Even this last division, except in the districts where the "black earth" is found, is not characterized by a fertility that redeems the severity of a climate, extreme in its summer heat as in its winter cold. In the seventeenth century a belief was current that the region about the Amur was, on the contrary, of great fertility, a belief which experience has shown to be ill-founded. It was, therefore, in this direction that the most venturesome Cossacks and the most energetic settlers hastened. They were not disturbed by the fact that the country belonged to the Chinese Emperor. In 1649, a young officer named Khabarof, undertook to descend the still unexplored river, building forts at the junction of the tributaries, conquering rebellious tribes of natives, and fighting troops of Manchurian horsemen (1649-1652). In 1658, Pachkof, governor of Yeniseik, founded Nertchinsk on the Shilka, a branch of the Amur. Five years later Albasin was founded. This was a fortress with ramparts of wood, and in its vicinity there arose many Russian villages. Finally, the Chinese, irritated at seeing these adventurers assume rulership over them, several times attacked Albasin with armies of from fifteen to twenty thousand men; but were invariably repulsed. Upon receiving tidings of these events, the court at Moscow sent envoys to that of Peking with a letter written in Latin and in Russian. After long deliberation at Nertchinsk a treaty was signed in that city, in 1689, in accordance with the terms of which the heroic fort of Albasin was to be razed; and the frontier between the two empires was definitely fixed as it continued to be observed by both countries down to the treaties of 1858.

On their side, the Russians renounced further forcible encroachment and settlement on Chinese territory; but they did not renounce their efforts to gain a foothold by commerce, religious mission work, and diplomacy in the Middle Kingdom, and even in Peking itself. The Russians that had been made prisoners at Albasin, or in battles at other places, had been taken to the capital of the empire. Some of them had established themselves there as artisans or merchants; others formed the Russian guard of the "Son of Heaven." At Moscow it was known that these men were well treated at Peking, but that they had neither church nor priest of their religion. Peter the Great resolved to send an embassy to Peking to secure satisfactory concessions on this point. This, indeed, was the object of a mission entrusted to Eberhard

Ysbrand, who reached Pekin in 1693, and there obtained what the Czar wished. In 1721, Tsmailof was despatched to the Chinese capital to secure from the Emperor Kanghi the privilege of establishing there a permanent Russian legation. He gave the Bodgy-Khan a letter from the Czar and left M. de Lange as chargé d'affaires; but the latter almost immediately after Tsmailof's departure was dismissed by the Chinese court. In 1727, a treaty that secured greater commercial privileges for the Russians was signed at Kiakhta. In 1806, Golovine, another envoy, was sent to Pekin with a view to obtaining the free navigation of the Amur River. This mission failed; nevertheless the position of Russia in the Asiatic East was continually growing stronger. In 1807, they had annexed the peninsula of Kamtchatka. In 1847, Count Nicholas Muravief, who was to win the surname of Amourski, became governor of Eastern Siberia, and set himself to develop and strengthen the colony.

RUSSIA IN THE FAR EAST

He perceived that it would have no future if possession was not secured of the chief river and the richest province of the region, that is, of the Amur and of Manchuria. The river was still so incompletely known that the Grand Chancellor Nesselrode declared to the Emperor Nicholas that its outlet was inaccessible. In 1848, a Cossack expedition, under Vaganof, perished without the escape of a single person to tell the tale. Two years afterwards Captain Nevelskoï discovered that Saghalin is really an island, separated from the mainland by the channel or strait of Tartary, and, in the course of his exploration, came upon the mouth of the Amur, entered it in a small boat, and planted the Russian flag on its banks; proclaiming to the natives that the country belonged to the "White Czar" at St. Petersburg. The Grand Chancellor was terrified at Nevelskoï's audacity; he already saw himself at war with China; he insisted that the daring captain's action be discountenanced, but the Emperor replied: "When

RUSSIA IN THE FAR EAST

Russia's flag has been raised anywhere it should not be taken down." On his part, Governor Muravief endeavored to persuade the local mandarins that the best thing to do was to leave the Russians alone. The Chinese demanded that negotiations be entered upon with their Emperor; Muravief thought that Peking was too far away for that and that Chinese diplomacy was too slow. He continued to act, therefore, as if the country was already a Russian province, and strengthened his position by building along the river the forts Alexandrovsk, Mikhaïlovsk, and Nicolaïevsk,—all of these, baptismal names of the royal family. Pétropavlosk, on the southeast coast of Kamtchatka, had been established in 1740. Other fortresses arose at the junction of the several principal tributaries of the Amur River. "The Amur will be the death of you," said the Emperor Nicholas jestingly to Muravief.

During the Crimean War the Anglo-French fleet blockaded the Russian Pacific coast, and destroyed a part of the military establishments and of the infant marine. This blockade, by threatening to starve out the colony, only hastened a decision upon the part of Muravief, who had need of Manchuria to furnish food for his colonists. Its annexation was already an accomplished fact, when, in 1857, Admiral Putiatin dropped anchor in the Gulf of Pechili and proposed to the Chinese Emperor, in consideration of Russia's armed intervention in the Taiping rebellion, the cession of Manchuria. China's only reply was a vigorous protest against Russian encroachment. War seemed imminent between the two empires. Fortunately for Russia, just at that time came the Anglo-French expedition and the march of the allies upon Peking. The Russians profited by this event to complete the annexation of the coveted territory. The Czar sent a fleet into the Chinese waters, and the Celestials did not relish having a third European power to deal with. By the Treaties of Aigun and Tientsin in 1858, they granted to Russia the entire left bank of the Amur, the entire territory between that river and the ocean as well as its tributary stream, the Ossuri, the bay on which there was, in time, to rise the fortress of Vladivostock, with its prophetic name (Dominator of the East). These newly acquired lands formed two provinces, the Amur Province and the Maritime Province. By the Treaty of Peking, in 1860, China ceded to Russia the region adjacent to the lakes Balkash and Issik-kul; the boundary line between Manchuria and Siberia was re-adjusted, and the Russians were granted the right to trade in all parts of the empire. Fifteen years more, and Russia obtained from Japan the abandonment of the latter's rights over Saghalin in exchange for the North Kurile Isles.

For nearly thirty years the boundary between China and Russia remained as agreed upon in the treaties of 1858 and 1860. But already the commercial and political activity of the Russians was overstepping it. They had established themselves in large numbers in the cities of Chinese Manchuria,—in Kiakhta, Mukden, Kirin, and Tsitsihar, the residence of the mandarin-governor. The navigation of the Ossuri and the Sungari Rivers fell wholly into their hands. The steamships of the Amur Company put Russia in rapid communication with Japan and San Francisco. “Scientific Missions” traversed China in all directions. At Peking the Russian colony acquired a continually greater importance and the ambassador of the Czar wielded more influence at court than the representatives of any other European power. His open handed liberality won him the favor of the courtiers, the mandarins, and the generals. In all the sea and river ports, the colonies of Russian merchants multiplied, and these seemed to live on better terms with the native population than the traders of other foreign nations. On the arrival of the Czarovitch, in 1891, he was honored with a series of royal entertainments.

THE CHINA-JAPAN WAR—INTERFERENCE OF RUSSIA—

CHINA and Japan, "The Middle Kingdom," and "The Land of the Rising Sun," the Bogdy-Khan and the Mikado, had disputed with each other for a long time, the protectorate of the kingdom of Corea. War broke out between the two empires in the July of 1894. The Japanese troops, drilled and equipped in the European manner, were everywhere victorious. Their warships, built in the best shipyards of Europe, sank the Chinese vessels. The Japanese occupied all Corea, stormed and captured Port Arthur, conquered a part of Chinese Manchuria, captured Wei-hai-Wei, threatened Peking, and finally imposed upon China the Treaty of Shimonosaki, April 17, 1895. China was compelled to renounce all her claims with respect to Corea; to give to her conquerors the Island of Formosa, the Pescadores, the peninsula of Liao-tung, with Port Arthur and Talien-Wan, to open five new ports, including Pekin, to their commerce; to grant them the right to open manufacturing establishments in the empire; and to pay a war indemnity of seven hundred and fifty millions.¹

The success of the Japanese had been so rapid that all the European powers were surprised at this sudden revelation of such a military and naval strength in the hands of the Mikado. England, at first hostile and malevolent, hastened to show more friendly feelings for the conqueror; the United States concluded a commercial treaty with the Japanese government; and all the plans that Russia had formed for supremacy in the Far East were threatened with failure. She could not allow either Wei-hai-Wei or the peninsula of Liao-tung, with the harbors that she had so long coveted, to remain in the hands of the Japanese. Should she do so, she would see herself relegated to the ports of Siberia and Northern Manchuria, closed by ice for a part of the year, and her hope of unfolding her colors in the seas of the Far East taken from her. She could not permit that the influence of triumphant Japan should be substituted at Peking for her own influence, already dating back a century or more. It was necessary, at any cost, even should it mean war, to prevent the provisions of the Shimonosaki Treaty being carried out. She was successful in enlisting the coöperation of two states which, although antagonistic to each other, had reasons for keeping the good-will of Russia. These three powers:—Russia, France and Germany,—formed what might be called “A Triple Alliance of the Far East.” They forwarded to the court at Tokyo some "friendly advice" regarding the giving up of claims that might bring about a general conflagration. It was hard for Japan to renounce the Liao-tung peninsula, with its harbors of Port Arthur, Talien-Wan, and Wei-hai-Wei, that had been conquered at the price of its blood, and by such brilliant victories; but the Japanese armies were on the Chinese mainland; the three powers were masters of the sea; and thus the island empire was left almost without defence. The three protesting powers had the advantage. Russia, in the deliberations over the revision of the treaty, showed such passionate insistence that twice, May 5, and May 8, Admiral Tyrtov made all preparations to meet the Japanese fleet, which probably would have gone to the bottom.¹ By the Treaty of Tokyo, May 8, 1895, Japan agreed to give up the Liao-tung and Wei-hai-Wei; to be satisfied with Formosa and the Pescadores, positions of the utmost importance in the Pacific; and to receive the war indemnity and certain commercial privileges.

As a matter of fact, Russia had just inflicted upon Japan the treatment that she herself had received from the European powers, after so many splendid victories over the Turks. It was under the pressure of a "European Concert" that Japan lost the most precious fruits of her success against the Chinese, just as the Russian conquerors of the Ottomans had lost theirs. Russia set up against Japan the principle of the integrity of the Chinese Empire in exactly the same way that the powers had imposed upon her the principle of the preservation of the Turkish Empire. The Treaty of Tokyo in 1895, modified the Treaty of Shimonosaki as completely as had the Treaty of Berlin modified that of San Stefano in 1878. And just as Russia, in 1878, has had the mortification of seeing her political foes, Austria and England, enrich themselves with the spoils of that very Turkish

COREA

Empire that they pretended to protect against her covetousness, laying their hands, the one on Bosnia and Herzegovina and the other upon the island of Cyprus; so Japan soon had the mortification of seeing Russia violate, for her own profit, that very principle of the continental integrity of the Chinese Empire that she had set up against Japanese ambition.

ENGLAND and France, the former in particular, obtained from China numerous important concessions¹; but of more value were those that Russia secured. By the convention of June, 1895, China contracted with her, through the intermediary of the Russo-Chinese bank, recently established at St. Petersburg, and under the direction of Count Oukhtomski whose Oriental policy we know, a loan of four hundred million francs at four per cent., payable in thirty-six years. On October 25, 1896, this same bank made another agreement with the Pekin government. This agreement, ratified by the Czar, became, on December 26, the Treaty of St. Petersburg. It gave the Eastern Chinese Railroad Company the right to build a road through Chinese Manchuria, making it a branch line of the Russian Trans-Siberian Railroad; to develop coal and other mines in the territory traversed by the road, and to devote itself to all other industrial and commercial enterprises. The stock of the company can be held by Chinese and Russians only, which means that it will fall almost exclusively into the hands of the Russians. A special clause authorized the Czar to station in Manchuria both infantry and cavalry for the protection of the railroad. This was the disguised annexation of all the part of the vast province that had not already been ceded to Russia in 1858 and 1860. Furthermore, China leased to Russia for fifteen years a harbor in the province of Shantung, and finally, Russian warships were given the privileges of the two harbors of Liao-tung peninsula, Port Arthur and Talien-Wan.

March 27, 1898, there was formulated a new agreement between the two countries. Port Arthur and Talien-Wan and all their dependencies were leased to Russia for a term of twenty-five years. With this was granted the privilege of building through the Liao-tung peninsula a railroad from Vladivostock to Port Arthur, which is merely another branch of the Trans-Siberian road.

Nor is this all. According to a still more recent agreement, a Russian railroad is to be built from Mukden in Manchuria to Peking. Another Russian company is to construct a system of Chinese railroads, the three principal lines of which, setting out from Peking, are to traverse, the first two, the provinces of Shansi and Honan, the third, the province of Hupé and to terminate at Hankow on the Yangtse-kiang. Against this third railroad, England made a vigorous protest. In her treaties with China, she had secured for herself the building of railroads and the commerce of the valley of the Yang-tse, and here the Russians were coming to cut off her railroads, and in the very heart of China to draw off the merchandise that she was counting upon to export by sea, and which was now likely to be carried by the Trans-Siberian line. After having secured the defeat at Peking of the propositions of a Franko-Russian syndicate, she encouraged two Chinese of high rank to apply for a contract to build the debated railroad. They found themselves unable to raise the necessary funds, and it was then that Russia, thanks to the energy of Count Oukhtomski, had the franchise transferred to a Franco-Belgian company.

Nevertheless, in November, 1897, Russia had neither the ability nor the wish to prevent the Germans from landing in the bay of Kiao-chow which she seemed to have reserved for herself, or from securing a lease of it for ninety-nine years. Neither could she hinder the English, incensed at the action of the Germans, from obtaining, in April, 1898, a lease of the harbor and bay of Wei-hai-Wei, evacuated by the Japanese. It thus happens that in the Pechili Gulf, from which Peking receives the greater part of its supplies, three European powers occupy places very near one another; the Russians at Port Arthur and Talien-Wan, the Germans at Kiao-chow, and the English at Wei-hai-Wei. The Pechili Gulf has become another Mediterranean, on whose shores rival Asiatic interests continue the rivalries of Europe. The position of Russia is much the strongest. She commands Peking, not merely by sea, but by all the overland highways. She alone of the three rival powers in the Pechili Gulf possesses a vast continental base of operations. She fronts China along a boundary line several thousand miles in length; she embraces and penetrates China; and she alone by her railroads, the Trans-Siberian, the Trans-Manchurian, and the Trans-Chinese, will be able to pour into the very center of China and into its capital a great European army. Recently in the revolution of the palace, which took place in Peking in September, 1898, it was manifest to what degree the influence of the Russian legation there was preponderant. The young Emperor, Kwang-Su, supported by Japan, and perhaps also by England, endeavored to shake off the tutelage of the Empress-Dowager, Tsu-Hsi, and of the viceroy, Li-Hung-Chang, the friend of the Russians, in order that he might inaugurate an era of reforms. The plot was discovered, the accomplices of the Emperor were executed or banished, and the Empress-Dowager reassumed full power.

In Corea, Russia took the place of China in the long-standing rivalry that the latter had carried on with Japan. At Seoul, in the palace of King Li-hui, it was the Russian faction which, as a conservative party, took the place of the old Chinese faction in opposition to the Japanese faction, which constitutes the progressive party of Corea. Japan and Russia disputed with each other not only political influences, but commercial exploitation. Russia might have employed force, but she feared lest Japan, the Great Britain of the Far East, might throw herself into an alliance with the Great Britain of Europe. Therefore, Russia now openly opposed Japan, and now again craftily manipulated her. In spite of the keenness of the contention, she had the shrewdness never to push matters to a rupture. In a series of agreements, dated May 14, 1896, February 24, 1897, April 25, 1898, respectively, the two rivals attempted to define the conditions of this sort of condominium and to establish an equitable division of commercial advantages, of mail and telegraph monopoly, and of police force. In this division, however, Russia seemed to secure the lion's share. She gained possession in Corea of a system of telegraph lines which she annexed to her Siberian lines; she managed to have the financial administration of the kingdom entrusted to Russians, and succeeded in having King Li-hui issue an edict that the future railways of Corea should be of the same gauge as those of Siberia.

With France in Tonquin and the region round about; Germany in Kiao-chow; England at Wei-hai-Wei, on the Blue River, and in the peninsula of Kelung before Hong-Kong; with Russia throughout all north China; the Japanese in Corea, in Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the United States in the Philippines,—it can be seen that the political problems of the Far East have become as complicated as the like problems have ever been in Europe or America.

WE have followed Russia in all the directions that her policy of expansion has carried her. It now remains for us to study the means that she has employed, especially in what concerns her expansion in the East.

The essential characteristic that distinguishes her Oriental from her Western policy, is that, while nearly all the progress she has made in Europe has been either the cause or the result of bloody wars like those of the Czars of Moscow against Poland, of Peter the Great against Charles XII., of Catherine II. and Alexander II. against the Ottomans, of Paul I. against the

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

French Republic, of Alexander I. against Napoleon, and of Nicholas I. against the Allies in the Crimea, her Oriental expansions have never brought her into war with a power of the first magnitude, not even with China.¹ However bellicose Russia may have shown herself in Europe, in Asia she has exhibited a prudence wholly Oriental. A score of times it has seemed that she was on the brink of a mighty war with Great Britain over the frontiers of India; with China over Albasin, Kuldja, or Manchuria; and with Japan over Liao-tung and Corea. Some sort of an agreement has always come in time to ward off an open rupture, as in 1872, 1885, 1887, and 1895, with Great Britain; and as at Nertchinsk, at Aïgun, at Tientsin, and at Peking with China. In 1871, war with the latter seemed imminent with respect to the Kuldja question, but, rather than proceed to extreme measures, Russia preferred to abandon a part of her conquest. In these agreements, Russia it is found, has generally the better part of the bargain. She understands how to utilize the amour propre of her adversaries. Thus, she helped the Chinese "to save their face," for example, by inducing them to lease for twenty-five or ninety-nine years what they would obstinately have refused to cede definitely. Thanks to this expedient, it appeared to the Chinese that the dignity and integrity of their empire would remain inviolate. England also has grown accustomed to allowing herself "to save her face," and to be put to sleep by the mesmeric passes, energetic, and at the same time, caressing of Russian diplomacy. She allows herself to see in the "explanations" brought to London, the proof that some bold Cossack raid, some thorough lesson administered to her Afghan clients, is the result of an "error", a "misunderstanding." A company of six hundred soldiers is almost always a "scientific expedition." The English minister, in order not to stir up strife, allows himself to yield, and hands over to his successor the task of disentangling the knot. This successor is careful not to meddle with what he himself was not mixed up in, and what the jingoes and London cockneys have already forgotten; and so what the Russians have skillfully acquired remains permanently in their possession. If the occasion demands it, they will declare that they did not intend to conquer Bokhara; but have they proved that they have not made a vassal state of it, something that will be more useful to them than an annexed province? They never intended to advance to Merv; but if the people of Merv of their own accord came to them, would it be a wise policy to reject a "voluntary" submission? And thus, slowly, silently, without excessive cracking of her whip, Russian supremacy, in her well-oiled car of progress, has been moving on through all Central Asia.

Russia is the only European power which has an absolute government. Its autocratic feature, so fiercely assailed upon the accession of

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

Nicholas I. by the "Constitutionals," or "Republicans," of 1825, and under Alexander II. by the Nihilist conspiracies, seems to have taken on a new life in the estimation of the Russian people, because, according to the expression of Prince Oukhtomski, it is the necessary condition of the greatness of their nation and of her "supernatural" and providential mission in Asia. If the foundation of the government remains autocratic, this autocracy, is at least more sincerely an "enlightened despotism" than was the absolutism of the eighteenth century, a despotism thoughtful of the economic interests and the well-being of the people, blending its ambitions with the legitimate aspirations of the nation. It has borrowed from the West municipal or provincial self-government, but not the parliamentary, not even the representative regimen. In Russia there is no minister responsible to legislative bodies, where changeable majorities successively displace one another; but ministers having the confidence of the sovereign continue in office for a long time, in such manner that from 1815 to 1882 Russia had only two ministers of foreign affairs, Nesselrode and Gortchakof, and since the latter date there have been only three, De Giers, Lobanof, and Muravief. How many have been those that have followed one another during these past eighty-five years in France, England, and even the United States! This permanency in office allows continuity of the same political views and constancy in realizing them. No parliament, therefore, no questionings, no blue or yellow books. A restricted liberty of the press closes with respect the indiscreet lips of reporters and interviewers. Hence secrecy in both planning and executing is possible. There is no need of throwing dust in the eyes of parliaments, of the newspapers, and of the people; nor is there any need of brag, optimistic proclamations, and of oratorical heroics. Great conquests can be accomplished silently.

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

This form of government, though it may appear as archaic as the despotism of Nebuchadnezzar or of the Grand Turk, does not exclude the use of the most modern appliances and scientific methods over which free peoples pride themselves; railroads, telegraphs, telephones, improved cannon and rifles, battleships and cruisers of the latest pattern, a thorough knowledge of history, of ethnography, and of all forms of human speech, from those of Finland to those of Kamtchatka. It does not exclude the system of military organization in vigorous operation by the powerful and enlightened nations of France and Germany, nor yet the art of securing from the people the maximum of military power.

Russia has a regular army like France and Germany, national militia like Switzerland, and irregular troops like those of the Shah of Persia and the Emperor of China. These irregulars date back to the beginning of Russian expansion. The Czars of Moscow had their Cossacks of the Dnieper, of the Don, of the Volga, and of the Ural. In proportion as conquest succeeded conquest, the soldier class of the subdued peoples were amalgamated with the Russians in the "Cossack armies" of the Terek, of the Kuban, of the Caucasus, and of Turkestan. There are to-day Cossacks of the Trans-Baikal, of the Pamirs, and of the Amur. For hundreds and thousands of kilometres, they constitute the grand guard of the regular army, the mobile curtain of light cavalry that will screen its movements, "free lances," for whose too audacious encroachment and too bold raids, it will be possible to disavow all responsibility.

Behind these, like another advance guard, come the merchants, adventurers also, merchant adventurers, as the English of the fifteenth century said. Behind these, again, sally forth the colonists in search of cheap land, and who, following the course of the rivers and streams, at times venturing into the jungles, found villages over which will soon rise the humble bell-tower of a church. All these people, Cossacks, officers, and soldiers of the regular army, merchants, colonists, and even the tchinovniks, or officials, possess to a degree not met with in any other European nation, the gift of adaptation to a new climate and environment, and the gift of assimilating native races or of becoming assimilated with them. The peasant of European Russia, very much mixed, especially in the East, with Finnish or Turkish blood and characteristics, does not differ essentially from the Ostiak and the Vogul of Western Siberia. These, in turn, show no marked difference from the Turkish population of Eastern Siberia, such as the Yakuts. From these to the Mongolian races, such as the Tunguses, the Buriats, and the Manchus, and from these to the Chinese population, there is scarcely any noticeable transition. There was a time, when from the Dnieper to the Pacific, all obeyed the same master, the Grand Khan, "the Son of Heaven," whose heir to-day is the "White Czar." From the Dnieper to the Pacific extends the same plain, are found the same climate and the same soil, barren steppes alternating with fertile mould; the same manner of life, of dwelling, and of dress; the same endurance of extreme cold, excessive heat, privations, fatigue, long journeys, and a half-nomadic existence; and the same tendency to Oriental fatalism, which the orthodox term Christian resignation. And thus, as Elisée Reclus remarks, the Yakuts easily become Russians and the Russians as easily become Yakuts, and both Russians and natives possess the same readiness in acquiring the language of the foreigner.

Does not the difference in religion constitute a barrier between them? The Russian peasant with his rudimentary faith, to which, nevertheless, he holds with all his heart, and even the pope, or parish priest, with his vaguely uncertain theology and his ignorance, are free from all intolerance. Any form of the Christian religion, whatever value it may have, although it clashes with the still less highly developed beliefs of the Mohammedan peoples, makes its way among tribes that are pagan, Shamanist, Fetichist, or vaguely Buddhist. Between the Russians and the pagans there is established a oneness of faith or superstition. There is no question of complicated dogmas devised by the subtle brains of Alexandria or of Byzantium. The untutored Siberians do not fall into controversies over the mystery of the Trinity, the twofold nature of the Redeemer, or transubstantiation. The idea of God is too lofty for these coarse minds, but they all agree in placing on the summit of their Pantheon Saint Nicholas, the Thaumaturgist, and above him, beneath him, or equal with him, Christ and the Virgin. Beneath these come saints, Christian or with a physiognomy that may be pagan, Buddhistic, and at times Mohammedan. And all this multi-form worship is in full harmony with the primitive cult of springs and of certain venerable trees, with the belief in demons of the forests and river sprites, and with the custom of wearing certain amulets that the orthodox priest, the Shamanist sorcerer, or the Hadji returned from Mecca, may furnish. What more is necessary in order to be, in this life, successful on the farm, or in fishing, or in hunting, or in war, and, in the next, to be certain of salvation? The Tunguse, the Buriat, the Vogul, and the Ostiak, who firmly believe in Saint Nicholas, have already become, or are in the process of becoming, Russian. Are not the Tchuvashi, the Mordva, and the Meshtcheraks all children of the same father, that is, subjects of the same Czar? Though they may be Mohammedans, do they not still believe in the virtue of certain magical words uttered by the orthodox priest, the efficacy of the holy waters in driving away Cheïtan (Satan) and evil Djinns, in the protection that Saint Blaise, the old-time god, Valoss, of the Russians, extends over their flocks, and in the cures wrought in the name of Saint Cosme or in that of Saint Damian, those heavenly physicians, who cure their adherents without requiring remuneration?

Those two scourges, journalism and theology, being almost unknown in the Asiatic Empire of the Czar, one can live there in a happy confusion of things. Politics does not create any differences among men, and religion scarcely any. There is no time to reflect and subtilize upon the more or less brown or yellow color of the face, the more or less turned-up shape of the nose, the more or less slant of the eyes, or the more or less prominence of the cheeks. In no degree of the social scale is there known the prejudice "of the skin," so pronounced among the English and Americans, and noticeable, but to much less extent, among the French, Portuguese, and Spanish colonists. Russian colonization is not destructive of aboriginal races; it does not exterminate them, it absorbs them. Marriages, legal or otherwise, are frequent between the conquerers and the conquered. Already, in the days of Ivan the Terrible, Tartar Khans became Russian princes. To her subjects of brown or of saffron complexion, of Buddhist or of Mohammedan religion, Russia has always shown more liberality than France has to her Algerian subjects. In Algeria it has become difficult for an Arab or a Berber to rise above the grade of captain, but majors, colonels, and even generals of Turkish or Circassian race, and even of the Mohammedan religion, are numerous in the Asiatic armies of the "White Czar."

The Russians of Europe are fully able of themselves to people their Asiatic colonies without having to assimilate the natives, and without the assistance of foreign immigration. Russia is fortunate in that her colonies are only a prolongation of her own territories. To become a colonist, there is no ocean to cross, no steamboat fare to pay. The poorest peasant, a staff in his hand, an axe at his belt, his boots slung from a cord over his shoulder, can pass from one halting-place to another, until he reaches the ends of the empire. Moreover, the population of Russia, by its own birth rate, increases, in spite of insufficient medical care at childbirth, with a rapidity unknown to any other nation of European blood, excepting, perhaps, the Canadian French. In 1878-79, the subjects of the Czar numbered ninety-six millions, in 1899 they reached one hundred and twenty-nine millions, an increase in twenty years of thirty-three millions, a number almost equal to the population of the kingdom of Italy, or an annual increase of about one million six hundred thousand souls, a number that about equals the present population of North Carolina or Alabama. With such a treasury of men to draw from, neither military power nor colonial strength will be lacking. In Siberia, before 1895, the increase of population by immigration alone was only about ninety-two thousand per year. Since the suppression of penal transportation, especially since the construction of the Trans-Siberian railroad, immigration has brought in two hundred thousand annually. The population of Siberia must by this time have reached the figure of seven millions. Of this number at least six millions are Russians. This, however, is one person for each square kilometre of territory, so that neither is there any lack of land.

For a long time the Russian sovereign needed two things to enable him to plunge boldly into the depths of Asia. First, he lacked the assurance that England or the German powers would not be able to foment on his European frontiers one of those coalitions like those that resulted in the Crimean War or in the revision of the Treaty of San Stefano; secondly, he lacked "the sinews of war," or, as the English phraseology is, "the Cavalry of Saint George." The alliance with France, outlined at Kronstadt in 1891, proclaimed at Paris in 1896, and at St. Petersburg in 1897, has given the Czar two things that were wanting. It assures the safety of the European frontiers against any effort of the Triple Alliance. In the Far East, in 1895, we have seen how, at the same time, France and Germany took in hand the interests of Russia against Japanese ambition and British hostility. The Germany of Bismarck attempted to ruin Russia's credit in the Berlin exchange and in the European market. France threw open her market and her credit to Russia, and either in France, or thanks to her, the Czar, within a few years, has been able to borrow several milliards. This has enabled him to strengthen his army, put a powerful navy afloat, consent to large loans to China and Persia, complete his European railroad system, and push forward the work upon the Trans-Caucasus, the Trans-Siberian, the Trans-Manchurian, and the Trans-Chinese railroads.

The results of the daring raids through Turkestan, in the direction of the Persian Gulf and of Afghanistan, and towards the Amur and the Japan Sea, are now consolidated by a wholly modern outfit of war and travel. In

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

Turkestan, the ancient capitals of Tamerlane, the fortresses conquered by the heroism of the Pérovskis, the Tchermaïefs and of the Skobelevs, all of which called for so much skill and careful manipulation on the part of Russian diplomacy, are to-day railroad stations. There are dining-room stations at Merv, Bokhara, Samarkand, Kokhand, Andijan, Tashkend, etc., and the Russian station of Kushk is only one hundred and twenty kilomètres from Herat. The Trans-Siberian railroad, with its numerous stations, its branch lines to Khabarovsk, Port Arthur, and Peking, and the annexed systems that penetrate the Chinese Empire, has consolidated all that was accomplished by the venturesome explorers of former times, from Irmak or Khabarof to Lieutenant Nevelskoï of our day. The principal line, six thousand two hundred kilomètres long, with its bridges of eight hundred mètres over the Obi and the Irtysh, of one thousand mètres over the Yenisei and the Selenga, with its ferryboat, one hundred mètres long, that ferries the trains across the southern bay of Lake Baikal, permits the transportation of colonists, merchants, regiments, and brings to bear upon the further side of Asia all the power of the Czar who reigns at St. Petersburg. In 1889, the merchants of Nizhni Novgorod, in an address to the Emperor Alexander III., predicted in these terms the brilliant future of the Trans-Siberian: "It will unite to Europe, through the Russian Empire, four hundred millions of Chinese, and forty-two millions of Japanese. One will be able to go from Europe to Shang-hai by Vladivostock in twenty days instead of the thirty-five which the Canadian route requires, or the forty-five of the Suez route." The distance between Europe and the Far East has been still further shortened by the extension of the Russian railroad to Port Arthur. In the commerce of the world, the Trans-Siberian will work as important a revolution as did the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope in the fifteenth century, or the construction of the Suez Canal in the nineteenth. The policy of Russia is to secure the full attainment of what she has been striving after for centuries in her onward march through the Siberian wilds, that is, access to seas free from ice, where her fleets of war and commerce may have unhindered course. Russia is striving for this freedom of the sea four hundred years later than Spain, Portugal, France, England, and Holland. She has lost nothing in having waited so long. Thus far, she has passed through the Baltic, and the Mediterranean periods, with a power for expansion unknown to her predecessors. She is about to inaugurate a new era in her history; the oceanic, the world-wide era, is merely beginning for the Slav.

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

RUSSIAN EXPANSION

A PSYCHOLOGICAL STUDY

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE:

A PSYCHOLOGICAL STUDY.

J. NOVICOW, Odessa.

THE psychology of a great nation is difficult to determine. When we have before us an organism composed of tens of millions of men, we may assume in advance that it contains the most varied and diverse elements. You may say of it whatever you please; the most opposite and contrary assertions may be equally true in regard to it. One is, therefore, necessarily reduced to certain broad generalizations, which remain in a very large measure superficial. Even approximate precision is impossible in matters of this kind. Errors and subjective irregularities are more likely to arise here than anywhere else. Almost involuntarily, every sociologist, in determining the psychology of his nation, gives more or less the psychology of his own individuality. In vain we may employ every effort to arrive at the impartial truth; we can never completely attain such a result. On the other hand, when one undertakes to define the psychology of a foreign nation, he falls into even greater inaccuracies. When we do not belong to a nation, when we have not breathed in its inherent atmosphere with our very first breath, we cannot feel as does this nation; and this makes it impossible to talk of it with any intelligence.

From still another point of view, it is difficult to define the psychology of a nation, because psychology is, in its very essence, vague and indefinite. When we think of the American, English, or Russian people, a certain picture, it is true, rises before the mind; but the outlines are so wavering and intangible that it is almost impossible to express this picture in words. The fundamental difference between people is marked far more by their manner of feeling than by their manner of thinking. But how are we to define in words this manner of feeling on the part of an individual, and, still more, that of a nation composed of millions of individuals?

But if the psychology of any people in general is difficult to determine, that of the Russian people in particular is very much more so. In the first place, we may ask ourselves, "What is the Russian nation?" It is a union of Slav populations inhabiting the northeastern part of Europe, a part of the Caucasus, and Siberia. But this branch of the Slav race is further divided into three great branches; the Great Russians, Little Russians, and White Russians. Some ethnographers and linguists maintain that the Little Russians should not be considered part of the Russian nation, but as an independent Slav nation, just like the Czechs and Poles. And here a new obstacle confronts us. We shall overcome it, however, by limiting ourselves in this essay to speaking of the Great Russians. This will be the more legitimate, since they form much the most numerous and important branch. The Great Russians compose more than two thirds of the Russian nation in general. There are about fifty millions of them, and they have also the advantage in intellectual development. The Great Russian dialect, the Muscovite dialect, is now the literary language of all Russia, the language of Pushkin, of Lermontof, and of Tolstoi.

Imagine an instrument for measuring the intellect and morality of men. Imagine that, with the aid of such an instrument, we had measured the intellect and morality of all the Americans, of all the English, and of all the Russians. I am convinced that we should obtain very similar averages. No one can dispute the fact, however, that at the different epochs of history, some nations may be more advanced than others. But the nations which are most in advance at a certain period may not be so at another. The Italians were much in advance of the English in the fifteenth century, which would seem to show that the psychology of a people is not immutable, and can hardly be definitely determined once and for all. Like a living existence, a people is continually changing; so that what we say of it to-day may be no longer true of it to-morrow. Hence a new difficulty arises in determining the psychology of a nation.

But the reader will doubtless inquire, "Since you recognize that so many obstacles lie before you, why undertake this task?" I do so at the solicitation of the Editor of this volume, and the precise object of these preliminary remarks is to secure the reader's indulgence for the imperfection of my work.

If the opinions stated in the following pages are not clear and well defined, if inaccuracies and contradictions appear there, it is for the reason that, in the nature of things, it is impossible to trace with geometric precision the outlines of a popular psychology. Life is a continually changing metamorphosis. He who speaks of living things must perforce limit himself to approximations more or less vague, and with little resemblance to algebraic theorems.

I. RACE AND TEMPERAMENT.

The Russian Empire contains more than sixty-five independent racial groups. It is a veritable Tower of Babel. Even with the omission of Siberia and Central Asia, there remain in Russia in Europe, and the Caucasus alone, forty-six different peoples. In the northwest, the Fins; in the west, the Lithuanians and Poles; in the southwest the Roumanians; and in the east, on the banks of the Volga, numerous groups of Uralo-Altaic populations: the Tcheremisa, Mordia, Votiaki, and Permians. In the southeast, there are the Tartars in Crimea, and Greeks on the Sea of Azof. Add to this the sporadic groups of Germans and Jews. All these numerous elements have in a great measure commingled. The history of Russia is the reverse, properly speaking of that of the United States. While in America there is an Aryan invasion proceeding from east to west, in Russia there is an Aryan invasion going from west to east. The centre from which the Slav emigrations set forth seems to have been the region of the Dnieper and Galicia. The upper tributaries of the Dnieper were settled first. The Slavs then reached the Baltic and founded Novgorod the Great. Later (from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries) they invaded the basin of the Volga, and founded successively Moscow, Nijni-Novgorod, Saratof, and many other cities. This movement is still going on. The American "Far West" has a counterpart in the "Far East" of Siberia. Nearly two hundred and twenty thousand Russian colonists settle there every year. But while the Aryans of America have almost exterminated the autochthonous population of the Redskins, the Russians emigrants have commingled with the ancient autochthonous populations of eastern Russia.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

The Russian people is thus, in its sum total, a mixture of Slavs and Fins.

Given such conditions, it is very difficult to determine the physical and physiological type not only of the Russian people in general,¹ but also of the Great Russians in particular. Are the latter dark or light? To tell the truth, they are both. According to the researches of ethnographers, we see that the number of Great Russians with dark hair varies, with the different regions, from fifth-one to fifth-seven in a hundred. These dark shades, furthermore, cover the entire scale from raven black to light brown. The same is true of the eyes as of the hair. Every shade is to be met with among the Russians, with a predominance, however, of grey eyes. If we consider blue and grey eyes as belonging in the category of light, and brown eyes as belonging in the category of dark colored ones, we must confess that, although in a slight degree, light shades rather predominate among the Russians.

(¹) We have already seen that they are divided into three great branches: the Great Russians (about fifty millions), the Little Russians (about twenty millions), and the White Russians (about five millions).

As to the conformation of the skull (to which is now attributed an importance which is as exaggerated as it is arbitrary), all types thereof are to be found in Russia. We find there the brachycephalic type, the mesaticephalic, and the dolichocephalic. But the archæological researches of recent years, which have been very accurate, are responsible for a singular discovery, to the effect that in ancient times in Russia the dolichocephalic type predominated, and that in recent times it has been continually decreasing. This remark completely subverts certain modern theories, in accordance with which the number of the dolichocephalic type increases with the greater development of intellect. It may be maintained, however, that the Great Russians are more dolichocephalic than the Slavs of the south,—the Bulgarians and Servians.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Of what race, then are the Russians? It is very difficult to say. In the first place, there is no longer a single pure race in Europe; but of them all, the Russian nation is certainly composed of the greatest number of races. Into the vast plain which serves as its country have rushed a thousand different peoples. The modern Russians are a most complex mixture, whose constituent elements it is impossible henceforth to distinguish. There is an analogy in this respect, also, between the Russians and the Americans, who are a product of the crossing of all the races of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the new continent.

Granted that the race of the Russians is so difficult to determine, it is even more difficult to describe their exterior aspect and their temperament. Every type imaginable is to be met with in Russia. The choleric, the lymphatic and the bilious. Apparently, however (this is a personal opinion of the author's, for there are no statistics on this subject), the lymphatic type predominates. In general, the Muscovites are very tall, have full forms, soft thick beards, and abundant hair. This would probably represent the average type of masculine beauty in the Russian race. The type of feminine beauty consists, also, in a rather lofty stature, and forms which are well rounded but neither slender nor graceful. While I am writing these lines, a type of the Russian woman arises before me. It differs from the American, English, and French woman, but a pencil is needed to draw it and not a pen.

II. GENERAL PSYCHOLOGY.

Moreover, I am in haste to pass on to the psychical factors. The race and its exterior traits are of very slight importance in sociology, and for this reason I do not think it worth while to dwell long upon them.

But it will be easily understood that there are quite as many, if not more, difficulties to be met with on the psychological plane than on the physiological. If it is not easy to determine what colored eyes predominate in a people (for which direct observation only is required), still less so is it to determine the sort of character. On this subject we shall have to content ourselves with general approximations.

Keeping within these limits, we may venture to assert that one of the most prominent traits of the Great Russian character is an inequality of effort. It would seem as if the Russians had modeled themselves on the climate of their country, which offers the greatest extremes of heat and cold.¹ It has been known for a long time, that among the Russians, periods of eager activity are succeeded by periods of an almost insurmountable apathy.

Very often, in Russia, certain individuals are the victims of an intermittent alcoholism. They remain for months, sometimes, without

(¹) At Yakootsk, in Siberia, thirty-six degrees of heat in summer follow sixty degrees of cold in winter, which makes a range of ninety-six degrees.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

drinking a drop of liquor. Then comes the period of alcoholism, and for a long time they are uninterruptedly tipsy from morning till night. For many Russians, too, this is their method of labor. They pass weeks doing nothing; and, then, all at once, they are capable of working thirty-six consecutive hours, and they then get through an enormous amount of work. Naturally, this remark applies rather to the wealthy and cultured, for the laboring classes of both city and country work regularly a fixed number of hours throughout the year. This inequality of effort is the trait among the Russians which will strike the stranger most forcibly. It seems to constitute a characteristic, as it were, of the Russian mind. It is in no sense a fatality inherent in the race, as the exponents of certain pseudo-scientific theories maintain. This inequality of effort is the result of historical circumstances, and when these circumstances shall have been modified it will disappear. What I have said

as to the degree of morality may be repeated of the amount of energy. This amount is evidently present in equal force in every nation, but according to the bent given by historical circumstances, one nation may possess more of it at a given moment than another. Until the sixteenth century, the English were known for their indolence and apathy. The Florentines who went to England in the fifteenth century found the English positively inert. The great activity of the American people in our own time comes, in great measure, from their realization of the magnitude of the task which lies before them (an entire continent, immense and amazingly fertile, to people and cultivate) and the political facilities which they enjoy. The Russians have a territory more vast and fertile even than that of the Americans and quite as uncultivated. There is, then, no lack of work for them. Unhappily they have not yet had a chance to have free play, from a political point of view; hence their state of apathy and discouragement.

But should there come a more fortunate period in their history, it is quite probable that there would be found no less persistency of effort among the Russians than among the Anglo-Saxons. Even now certain individual proofs of this may be seen, for inequality of effort is very far from being a universal fact among cultivated Russians.

If the Russians often experience these periods of apathy, we may at least exhibit in contrast with them some examples of a force of energy, calm and tenacious, which serves to overcome all obstacles. Cases of this may be frequently observed among the men, though that is but natural. Per contra, they are much more remarkable when found among the women. For the Russian woman has given some admirable examples of heroism. Struggling at times against much greater obstacles than her American sisters, she has succeeded in obtaining an important place, notwithstanding, in science, art, and literature. Generally speaking, the intellectual emancipation of the Russian woman, at the present time, seems to us in advance of that of the German, French, Italian, or English woman. The American woman alone, with her high mental culture, seems to us able to bear comparison with the Russian.

What is, in our day, the dominant trait of the Russian woman? It is very difficult to say. All traits meet in her. Unquestionably that of a formal sentimentality no longer predominates, as it did at the beginning of the nineteenth century; but it is almost impossible to determine just what type of woman is acknowledged to prevail at the present moment in Russia.

III. SENTIMENT.

From the point of view of sentiment, we may say that a large amount of good nature is very characteristic of the Russian. Of all the peoples of Europe, this is, perhaps, one of the least cruel.

I know that such an opinion has almost the air of a paradox. The Russian people have an execrable reputation. The knout, Siberia, the extreme severity of the government, intolerance, Poland, the sufferings of the Nihilists, the persecution of the unhappy Jews,—all this has given the Russian nation a reputation for universal cruelty.

In order, therefore, to have my opinion respected, it will be necessary to support it by facts. I shall allege, in the first place, that you never observe among the Russians any popular sport of a brutal character,—such as cock fights, bull fights, or even boxing, or pugilism. Neither are customs like “lynch law” to be met with, which, though justified by the social exigencies of certain times, is nevertheless a very cruel practice. In this summary course of procedure, the penalty of death is very often inflicted for offences which, in truth, hardly merit so terrible a punishment. Another proof of the gentle nature of the Russian people is the security which reigns, both on the high roads and in the country districts. Within the memory of man, there has not been a region of Great Russia which has been permanently infested with brigands. Night and day, one may traverse the most lonely roads with a sense of perfect security. Crimes are occasionally perpetrated, but only in sporadic and individual cases. For centuries, now, there has not been seen in Russia a social condition such as was presented recently by Spain, the Kingdom of Naples, Sicily, Greece, and such as Turkey still presents. The only portion of the Russian Empire where highway robbery still exists, is in the southern part of the Caucasus; but there it is practiced by the indigenous populations, and more often by the Mussulmans.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Every one knows the feelings aroused in the lower classes of the Russian population by those who have been judicially convicted. It is pity, with which hardly an atom of hate or resentment is mingled. Finally, we must observe that Russia was the first to suppress the death penalty for offences against the common law.

It may be stated, further, that, in many cases, the Russian administration is rather badly run, precisely because of the natural good nature of the nation. The chiefs are sometimes so complacent that they not only cannot make up their minds to dismiss their subordinates, but often do not even have resolution enough to censure them. The public service naturally suffers. It is the same with pensions. The municipal and provincial council boards are extremely lavish with them. Very few people have within them the courage to refuse, categorically, such help when demanded, even though this may not be absolutely needed. Numerous abuses proceed from this kindness of character.

Whence comes it, then, that the Russians have so great a reputation for cruelty?

From several causes. In the first place, we may observe in them the same trait in point of sentiment as in point of mental activity. The Russian is very unequal. If carried away, under certain circumstances, until he is quite beside himself, he may commit the greatest excesses. The Russian is less master of himself than the Anglo-Saxon. But these very acts of cruelty, which are very uncommon, make the greater impression the rarer they are. The public likes to generalize, and is apt to consider as an habitual trait of character what is for the most part exceptional. I do not mean that there are no cases of cruelty among the Russian people, and that they are better than any others. No; I only wish to say that, as is very commonly believed, they are no worse.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Aside from the inequality in his character, there are several other causes which lead to a belief in the cruelty of the Russian. In the first place, facts of a political nature. When it is a question of reasons of state, the sentiment of pity seems to vanish. Severe legislation is believed to be necessary, in order to save the state, and thus all pity seems a culpable weakness. If our ancestors, in the Middle Ages and up to within comparatively recent times, had such harsh penal legislation it is not that individually they were any worse than we are; it was only because they believed such legislation indispensable. Russia, having developed more slowly than other nations of the West, preserved longer certain archaic and cruel institutions, like slavery and corporal punishment. All the European nations have had, at some time, penal laws as barbarous as those of Russia; but they have sooner given them up. The sight of the Russian inflicting very severe punishments, already forgotten in the West, is the source of the inference that they were more cruel than the Occidentals. This was not the case; they were only less advanced in point of ideas. They still believed these barbarous punishments to be necessary, after the other nations no longer shared in their error.

And, then, the Russian government has an execrable reputation; since nearly all the civilized countries have become constitutional, and Russia has not, the line has been drawn, as it were, between the Russian government and the others. The former is in nowise the most cruel, but it is believed to be so. And, then, the Russian government commits one great fault: it judges political offences with closed doors. There may thus naturally be put to their account a whole series of cruelties which they have never committed. I am convinced that the number of individuals sent to Siberia for political crimes, during the whole course of the nineteenth century, does not exceed, perhaps, three or four thousand persons.¹ But the figures current in public opinion in the West are infinitely larger. Of course these figures are hypothetical. People speak with the greatest fluency of fifty or sixty thousand persons a year. Human imagination has no limits!

The political prisons of Russia have everywhere an execrable reputation. It is true that here and there revolting cruelties may be found. Political convicts are deprived, unhappily, of all legal protection. Their fate depends upon the personal character of the individual who is in charge of their prison. And among these individuals are to be found some who are monsters. But, generally speaking, I believe that political prisoners experience no worse treatment in Russia than in other countries.

(1) This is a purely personal opinion, for precisely in consequence of the very mystery with which the Russian government surrounds itself, there is no accurate information to be had on this subject.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

If we examine closely certain special cases, we may convince ourselves that the Russian government is no more cruel than any of the others.

The reputation for severity of the Emperor Nicholas I. is well known. It was so terrible that a certain English author was amazed to learn that he was an excellent father of a family and was very fond of his children. It seemed to this author as if Nicholas I. were a vampire, thirsting for blood. Let us see the facts. The Emperor Alexander I. died, in 1825, without issue. His younger brother, Constantine, having renounced the throne, it reverted to the third brother, Nicholas. But Constantine's renunciation was not generally known. On the death of Alexander, the oath of allegiance to Constantine was taken by many official bodies in St. Petersburg. A few superior officers of the guard availed themselves of this circumstance to incite the troops against Nicholas, and to make the attempt to suppress autocratic power in Russia. This is what is called the Revolution of December. After Nicholas had subdued them, he caused the officers who had revolted against him to be tried. Five only were condemned to death and executed. Thus a revolt of the army against their legitimate sovereign (for that was how Nicholas I. regarded it) caused the blood of but five persons to be shed, and this in barbarous Russia, and by one of her most cruel monarchs.

Let us see what was passing in the countries of the West at this same period. I shall not speak of France and the Revolution. Such a comparison would be impossible. There, under a mere suspicion, people were sent to the guillotine. The great poet André Chénier was beheaded for sympathizing with the Royalists, and also because he had written some verses against the members of the National Convention! But, long after the "Terror," the French government had become no more beneficent. In 1824, four unhappy sergeants were executed in France only because they were members of a secret society. Is it necessary to recall the summary military execution by the Austrians in 1848? How many victims then perished! And no vulgar conspirators either, but noble warriors who had fought openly and bared their breasts to the enemy. But of all the European nations, Spain assuredly holds the palm for cruelty. In 1824, seven Free Masons were there executed, simply for having held a meeting! In 1831, a young man was hung for having cried "Hurrah for Liberty!" A woman was hung in Granada for having embroidered a flag with the inscription, "Law, Liberty, Equality." Such examples might be multiplied. But these which I have just cited are sufficient, it seems to me, to show that the Russian government is far, indeed, from being as cruel as those of Western Europe. Simply because it is autocratic, while the others are constitutional, it enjoys a reputation which it does not always merit.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

What I have just said is to prove what I have already advanced on the subject of the good nature of the Russian people. But, in consequence of the unevenness of character which is one of their dominant traits, this habitual good nature may be transformed at times into very great brutality, as I shall have occasion to point out when I come to speak of politics.

Next to their good nature, one of the most universal traits of the Russian people is a large share of melancholy and sadness. The life of the Russian is far from being a very happy one. The country itself is not cheerful. During six months of the year, it is shrouded in snow, and, in Summer also, the coloring is rather dull.

The great pine forests which occupy all the northern part have a melancholy aspect. But even the caducous species which prevail in

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Russia (the birch, for example,) have not very brilliant tints. Elsewhere the surface of the ground is gently undulating. The country is completely lacking in relief and character. The eye glides, as it were, over infinite spaces which lose themselves on the horizon, and seeing no landmark, one is overcome as with a vague feeling of unrest.

History has been even more severe upon the Russian people than nature. Russia has been, during long centuries, exposed to the inroads and predatory incursions of the nomadic tribes of Asia. The last invasion of the Tartars of Crimea into Russia in Europe took place in the second half of the eighteenth century. Up to comparatively recent times, the Russian people have lived under an entire sense of insecurity and constant apprehension. To the invasions of the nomads is added another terrible enemy of the Russian,—fire. Russia has almost no stone, but possesses on the contrary immense forests. Naturally, most of the dwellings there have been built of wood. With wood, conflagrations are inevitable, and this plague destroys fifty million dollars' worth of property every year. Naturally, the country villages suffer most, and as there personal property is rarely insured, it will be seen that it is the poorest class of the population which is the most cruelly affected.

The fact that the Russian people have this constant sensation of international insecurity has been the means of driving it to granting so large a measure of authority to the central government. As the officials have not been slow to abuse this power, the Russian people have been obliged to submit to innumerable vexations. Add to this, serfdom, which was introduced in 1596, and which has been the cause of the most horrible injustice and abuse. In consequence of these and many other circumstances, which it would be impossible for me to set forth here, the Russian people has in truth been one of the most unfortunate upon the face of the earth. History has stamped it with a large share of melancholy, combined with a profound resignation, and with a fatalism which is manifested in a thousand different ways. The Russian, at times, allows his life to glide along just as it happens, without even making an effort to react against his sad destiny. He seems to be constantly asking himself, "What is the use?"—to be constantly consoling himself with the reflection that "such is the inevitable order of things." On the other hand, when he makes up his mind to act, his fatalism causes him to have great faith in his lucky star. The "go ahead" of the Americans has its counterpart in the Russian "avos."¹

It is said that fatalism conduces to acquies-

(¹) "Avos" is an adverb which exists in no other language. It corresponds to the French expression "à la grâce de Dieu." More literally it means "perhaps"! The "Quien sabe" of the Spanish is an analogous expression. "Perhaps it will succeed; let us risk it!" is the complete meaning of the word "avos."

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

cence. This is not always true, for that it sometimes provokes to action, we must admit. Together with evidences of an extreme conservatism, the Russian people give also at times proofs of an endless spirit of adventure, so to speak. The occupation of Siberia is one of the best examples of this. Single individuals have, during more than three centuries, been in the habit of venturing into this region, and have been stopped only on reaching the polar ice and the waters of the Pacific Ocean. The occupation of the Russian Far East has been much more difficult than that of the American Far West, if only for the reason that the greater part of it was undertaken in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, before the advent of steam and telegraphy.

It is true, then, that melancholy and fatalism are characteristic traits of the Russian people, who certainly cannot be ranged among the cheerful nations of the earth. The Russian has also, however, times of mad exuberance, when he abandons himself entirely to pleasure. At such times the inequality of his character is apparent in its greatest extent.

There may be observed among the Russian people a large element of generosity. The Russians are fond of saying that the national mind is singularly free from all niggardly elements. Exceptions are doubtless in evidence here and there; some are to be found who are very economical, and there are even misers, but that is not the dominant type of the nation. In the immense majority of the cases, the Russian is hospitable, and thinks nothing of the expense when it is a question of his own amusement, or that of others. A great many Russians, too, live beyond their means, and are in constant pecuniary embarrassments. And generosity in money affairs is duplicated by a universal generosity in personal relations. The Russian is generally very tolerant in social intercourse. He is lenient in judging the conduct of others, and easily overlooks violations of morality committed by his associates. Austerity has but a small place in his conception of things. Many foreigners, the English above all, are amazed at the tolerance which reigns in Russia with regard to social affairs. Society exercises but a feeble restraint upon the individual; and permits him to live as seems best to himself. Whether a person goes to church every Sunday or not, is something about which people trouble themselves very little in Russia. One might say that to compensate for their lack of political liberty the Russians allow themselves a very large share of social liberty.

Thanks to the good nature and tolerance of the nation, social intercourse is marked by a spirit of great cordiality among the Russians. Among their equals, they call each other by their Christian names, accompanied by that of the father, with a termination which shows the affiliation, as, for example, Alexander Nicolae-vitch (Alexander, son of Nicholas). This custom lends great simplicity to the intercourse between individuals, for it is almost invariably used even between people of different hierarchical rank. Thus, in society, for instance, between officers and generals, when off duty. The appellations which are used in dealing with the common people are also very caressing: "batiouchka" (little father), "goloubtchik" (little pigeon), etc., etc.

In general, a certain democratic equality pervades the intercourse between classes even of a very different social status. There are, however, unfortunate exceptions to this. Many Russians belonging to the former generation have not yet given up the custom of addressing the common people with "thee" and "thou," though this remnant of former lack of courtesy shows, happily, an increasing tendency to disappear.

Having discussed their good qualities, I must now indicate some of the defects which are very frequent among the Russians. They are usually very careless, both in their dress, and more particularly in their business affairs. They have little of the systematic temperament. They are also very prolix, and have no more idea how to introduce order into a statement of their ideas than into the management of their households. The Russians also have rather an indifferent idea of punctuality, and do not yet appreciate the value of time, for themselves, nor, unhappily, for others. Neither is their good faith very extraordinary, and in economic relations it is often necessary to take many legal precautions when dealing with them. "Time is money," and "Honesty is the best policy" are proverbs which have not as yet received a very general application in Russia. It must not be supposed, however, that the level of morality in business affairs is at all like that to be found in Spain. Certainly not! One may even point out some sufficiently conspicuous features of honesty. Thus, private individuals, in making payments, often give rolls of gold wrapped in paper. These are usually taken without being opened, and it is very rare that there is any cheating. This is no longer true, however, of cheques. These are carefully verified by the banks, before being paid.

IV. INTELLECT.

We pass now to the domain of thought, which is the proper sphere of a national psychology. I shall dwell somewhat longer upon this; I shall speak of both philosophy and religion, but only briefly, of course, as comports with the limits of this article.

Beginning with philosophy, I shall observe, in the first place, that Russia has produced no great original philosophical system, like that of Descartes, of Leibnitz, of Spinoza, or Hegel. Doubtless the absence of the liberty of the press has in a certain measure contributed to this result. A Russian book, in which it was said that Jesus was merely the son of Joseph, a carpenter at Nazareth, would not be suffered to pass by the censor. It will be understood that under such conditions as these, it would be somewhat difficult to produce a complete system of philosophy, to state one's ideas without reserve, and with the purpose of saying only what one believed to be true. The fact, however, should be taken into consideration that Descartes, Spinoza, Leibnitz, and Voltaire wrote at a time when censorship was hardly more tolerant than it is in Russia to-day. In reality, researches which are purely abstract into the domain of psychology or metaphysics, receive a sufficiently wide toleration in the empire of the Czars. Besides, if a Russian author were unable to have his philosophical works printed in his own country, there would have been nothing to prevent his having it done in a foreign one.

The absence of great philosophical systems may be easily explained, moreover, in other ways. Russian thought began to mature in the second half of the nineteenth century. But at that time the construction of great philosophical systems had been, so to speak, given up. The last great system of Europe,—that of evolution,—formulated by Herbert Spencer, is rather a systemization of the sciences, in accordance with a general plan, than a philosophical construction in the true acceptance of the term.

In any case, whether owing to the influence of obstacles of a political nature, or that the historical era was not propitious, it is still true that Russia has produced no national philosophical synthesis. There is, as yet, no system which may be called the purely Russian philosophy. It is sufficiently difficult even to discover which of the great systems of Western Europe is really most highly esteemed in Russia, and possesses the greatest number of adherents. Heine said that the real philosophy of Germany was Pantheism. We should be quite at a loss to formulate any such proposition in regard to Russia. Without contrasting doctrines as opposed to each other, such as Deism and Panthe-ism, one would find it very difficult to say whether the Russian mind is more mystical or positivist. A great number of observers, especially foreigners, would incline without hesitation to the theory of mysticism. The Russian mind seems to them to have something about it, the outlines of which are indefinite and not to be distinguished from the mystical.

This is the case, above all, in politics, as I shall have occasion to show later. To say, however, that mysticism is the most pronounced, or even the wholly predominant trait of the Russian mind, would not be absolutely true. There is in it, also, very strong current not only of realism, but even of positivism. A large number of Russians regard metaphysical and mystical abstractions with a contempt as profound as it is unfeigned. When statistics are taken of the blonds and brunettes among the Russians, it is seen that fifty-one in a hundred have dark hair, and forty-nine in a hundred have light hair. If statistics of the Russian mind could be taken, it would perhaps be found, also, that out of one hundred individuals forty-nine were mystics, and fifty-one positivists. But, of course, such a table of statistics is out of the question. We must turn, then, to the publications and teachings of philosophy.

Of what has been written we must, of course, notice the different periods. Toward 1840, Russia was in great part Hegelian. Later, toward 1860, there was a violent outbreak of Materialism. Büchner and Moleschott enjoyed there an enormous prestige. A constellation of Russian publicists, with Pisemski at the head, threw themselves with ardor into the Materialistic movement, putting the greatest amount of fervor into undermining the ancient idols. It was, to a certain extent, from this intellectual tendency that Nihilism sprang. When, after the assassination of Alexander II., Nihilism again subsided, it seemed as if Russian thought turned away from great speculations.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

For more than twenty years Russia has seemed to live without a philosophy. Herbert Spencer's theory of evolution has gained some adherents in Russia, as well as some of the other systems, but without penetrating as deeply into their minds as the Materialism of Büchner and Moleschott.

No remarkable original work, consecrated to philosophy, has appeared in recent years, in Russia. Tolstoi, after having written very remarkable novels, has published different articles on religion, in which he has been led to consider certain philosophical questions; but he has done so only in passing, without devoting any great amount of attention to them.

What is there in store for the future? After the lull and languor which have fallen upon Russian thought, at the present time, what may be expected to happen? Let me venture an hypothesis which I admit in advance to be a purely personal intuition. It seems to me that Monism will be the future philosophy of Russia.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

This doctrine appears to me to be the one which will be most probably accepted by all other countries, and, I think, it will end by conquering Russia also.

If, after the philosophy, I am asked what is the religion of the Russians, I shall be even more at a loss for a reply.

It may be said, in the first place, that there are almost as many religions in Russia as there are ethnical groups. In the Baltic provinces and in Finland, Protestantism prevails. Poland is Catholic. In the ancient principality of Lithuania, (the western Russia of the present) the nobility and the upper middle class are Catholics, the peasants in the country districts orthodox.¹ In the south there are the Mussulmans in Crimea, in the east Mussulmans again, on the banks of the Volga. Add to this four or five million Israelites, scattered throughout the western provinces of the empire, and Protestants again on the banks of the Volga, recruits from the German colonies.

(1) You know that this is the name by which that branch of the Christian Church, which in the fifth and sixth centuries separated itself from Rome, is called; the Greek Church of the East, denominated schismatic by the Catholics.

Officially all great Russians are orthodox. Russia is still unhappily a confessional state in every sense of the word, and suffers the unfortunate consequences thereof. The laws are made to uphold orthodoxy. Above all, the Sovereign and his family must be orthodox. The state protects this form of religion by a set of laws, which practically abolish liberty of conscience in the Empire of the Czars. Replying to a petition which had been addressed to him in favor of toleration by an English society, Mr. Pobédonostzef, the procurator of the Holy Synod,¹ replied that religious toleration was the

(¹) The Russian Church is administered by a superior council of three archbishops nominated by the Emperor. The Emperor has, besides, a delegate in this council, who is the procurator of the Synod. In reality all the power in administrative affairs belongs to the procurator. It is said that the Emperor is pope in Russia. If it is meant by that that the Emperor interferes in fundamental rule of the Russian Empire. In making this reply, he was evidently playing upon words. It is true that Catholics, Mussulmans, and Israelites are authorized to practice their forms of worship in Russia. But any person who tries to convert a member of the Orthodox Church from his faith, even in the interest of another Christian profession, is liable to exile in Siberia. If the conversion be in the interest of a non-Christian religion, it is forced labor for eight or ten years. Toleration must be interpreted in a very narrow sense to be understood in the merely passive way in which M. Pobédonostzef understands it. Religious liberty consists in recognizing the dogmatic questions, nothing is more untrue. Never has the Emperor of Russia shown any intention of modifying one iota of the canons of the Church or of the ritual. But, as regards the administration of the Church, this is indisputably in the hands of the Emperor. The nomination of the bishops cannot be made without his consent. Owing to this power he is able to remove any ecclesiastical dignitary who shows the slightest inclination toward independence.

sacred and inviolable right of the individual to preach what seems to him to be the truth.

Russia is, at the present moment, then, an orthodox confessional state, just as England was formerly an Anglican confessional state.

Let us see, now, what position is held in Russia by this orthodoxy, which the government takes under such excessive protection.

I do not think it will be paradoxical to affirm that orthodoxy is the religion of a very small number of the Great Russians. This is what I mean. Greek Christianity has been preached in Russia since the tenth century. And notwithstanding the long period which has since elapsed, it may be boldly asserted that it has not yet penetrated into the conscience of the whole Russian people; that is, to no greater degree than has Catholicism into the conscience of some of the Western nations, like the Italians, for example. Out of one thousand Russians, eight or nine hundred (counting the women also) would not know how to recite, even mechanically, the Nicene creed. If the individuals here referred to were asked in what they believed, their reply would be but little suggestive of Christianity. Of the one hundred Russians out of the one thousand who might know the Nicene creed, there would be, perhaps, barely ten who would understand its literal meaning, and one, perhaps, who would understand its doctrinal meaning. But, three quarters of the time, those who thus understand it entirely believe no longer therein.

In reality, Christianity is merely a veneer in Russia. It has not as yet penetrated to the consciences of the lower classes, and it is already given up by the upper classes of the nation. Conscientious Christianity is the portion of a very small minority belonging to the middle class and the inferior nobility.

But we know how little important is dogma in religion. What man ardently seeks in a faith is, first, a protector and then that special and exalted emotion called religious sentiment.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

The more unhappy a people is, the less they can obtain justice here below, the more do they appeal to Heaven for it. We have said before that the Russian people was but poorly provided in the matter of happiness. They live in a severe climate, which permits of little indolence and little of the dolce far niente. On the other hand, much of Russia is but moderately fertile. The Russian people is no better off with regard to politics. The nation has practically no resource from the arbitrariness and exactions of officials, who take both their time and their money. It is natural that this people should feel more than any other the need of having recourse to divine protection. They address themselves to God, to Jesus Christ, to the Virgin, and to the Saints. Hence the great amount of devotion to be observed in Russia, the pilgrimages, the worship of miraculous images, the crowds of people who flock to the churches.

On the other hand, adoration is the act which satisfies the necessity for religious exaltation inherent in the human soul. The Russians give themselves up more ardently to exterior forms of worship than do the French, the English, or the Americans. This comes, it seems to me, from the fact that its civilization being less advanced, the only means of satisfying its emotional needs which it possesses, is religious worship. But these forms of worship have upon them a purely hypnotic effect. The Russian people understand almost nothing of what the priest is saying during Mass. They probably do not know even that the orthodox Mass is a commemoration, symbolical of the sacrifice made by the Son of God to redeem mankind. The Russian priests make every effort to give the parts of the Mass which are read in a totally incomprehensible manner. They are perfectly right in this, for if the words of the service were clearly understood they would appeal directly to the intelligence, and would not produce their intended effect, namely, a purely sentimental suggestion. The orthodox Mass is singularly ritualistic. It is no living condition, but is congealed within forms which have endured for centuries. The Eastern Church sustains the principle that what is true cannot change. Thus she modifies in no particular, either her form of worship or her dogmas. Preaching is disappearing more and more in the Russian Church. Sermons are given only on rare occasions. There are two reasons for this. First, because preaching has very little object, when it is asserted beforehand that there is not an iota of anything to change in the traditions of the past. Jesus, on the contrary, it is true, modified or obliterated that which had been "said to them of old time," by his own "I say unto you," and it was just to maintain this new doctrine, which had not been said to them of old time, that Jesus preached his sermons. If it had not been for that we would have had no reason for speaking. The second circumstance which has caused preaching to be given up by the Russian church is the distrust of the government. The priest who wishes to deliver a sermon must first write it, and then submit it to the approval of his bishop. Then only may he read it in church. But he is forbidden to say anything more than what he has put down in his notes; he may not improvise, or let himself go, under the inspiration of the moment, and speak freely. One may imagine that, under such circumstances, very few priests in Russia care to submit to the drudgery of delivering sermons, and when they do decide to do so, the faithful listen to them with the most profound weariness. First, because they are generally delivered in a cold, monotonous tone, and because, too, nine-tenths of the time they are utterly meaningless. The absence of liberty has killed the eloquence of the pulpit in Russia.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

We may make still another observation which will show how little Christianity has entered into the Russian soul. For the nine centuries

during which they have been Christians, the Russians have not introduced one atom of life into orthodoxy. Look at France and Catholicism. During the Middle Ages, and in modern times, France has repeatedly been a leader of Catholic thought. The University of Paris has, at different times, possessed the most remarkable theologians of Western Christianity. There has been nothing like this in Russia. There, they have accepted the Byzantine ritual without change. The Russians have confined their pride to interpreting the Greek texts with the most complete and servile literalness. The Russian Church has not, in its nine centuries of existence, given to the world either a great theologian, or a great doctor of the faith, or a saint who is at all remarkable or out of the ordinary, or a celebrated missionary, or even a great preacher. The only new element which the genius of the Russian people has introduced into the mummified body of the Orthodox Church is music. There, they have been creative, and wonderfully creative. The celebrated musician, Berlioz after hearing Mass sung by the choir of the cathedral in St. Petersburg, cried out, "I do not know how they sing in Paradise, but it seems to me that it cannot be very much better than this." The music of the Russian Church, which developed especially at the close of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century, forms an entirely original school; it derives inspiration from no other, and its grandeur is at times as wonderful as its originality. The Russian Church allows no instrument to be used in its service; not even the most divine instrument of man's invention,—the organ. The entire Mass is thus sung by choirs composed entirely of men, in which little boys take the soprano and contralto parts.

Is the Russian people, then, essentially religious or free thinking? Foreigners would all reply with one voice, "It is religious; it is even the most religious of the nations of Europe."

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Certainly, to judge by appearances (the only thing by which a stranger can judge, since he must look on the outside only), the Russian people are very religious, for it is prodigal of its proof of devotion. But there are many signs, too, which indicate their complete indifference in matters of religion. You must know, first, that in Russia the Church alone holds the records of the civil State, and that she alone can dispense certain sacraments which are of the greatest civil and political importance. There is no marriage in Russia other than the religious one. Consequently, there is no other way of contracting a legal marriage than by going to church. Baptism is also of enormous importance. It alone can establish the affiliation which transmits hereditary rights, civil as well as political. In Russia the citizens are divided into several different social classes (peasants, artisans, merchants, nobles, etc.), whose privileges are far from being equal. There are, besides, the "non-

Christians"¹ who are there deprived of a great number of rights.

Since the certificate of baptism constitutes the sole act of the civil state, its importance may be readily understood. A Russian belonging to a family which is officially orthodox may be in vain the most liberal thinker in the world; it would be impossible for him to neglect having his child christened, for without that, it would not be considered legitimate.

The Russian clergy are not paid by the State. The expense would be beyond its means. There are nearly three hundred and twenty-five thousand parishes in Russia. Now, if each had a single priest, and he were given but five hundred dollars a year, it would necessitate under this head alone an annual expenditure of one hundred and sixty-two million dollars, which would be about a third of the ordinary Russian budget. For their support the priests in the country have had assigned to them two sources of revenue: a plot of ground, which they may cultivate on their own account, and sometimes with their own hands, and the traffic in sacraments. The priest seeks, naturally, the greatest amount of profit possible. He sometimes exacts for christenings, and particularly for marriages, fees which the peasants are not always able to pay. Bargaining begins. There are cases where young people are not able to be married for weeks and months, because they are unable to pay the sum demanded by the priest for the religious ceremony. It will be understood that such circumstances result in sufficiently unpleasant relations between the pastor and his flock. And, notwithstanding these exactions, the Russian priest remains generally very poor, for the reason that the sheep which he may shear have unfortunately but very little wool. The Russian priest is ill-informed and rarely of much elevation of character; he is married, and has many family cares; and by reason of all this, inspires but little respect in the faithful. By some he is detested as one who is continually taking advantage of them, and by others he is little respected on account of an obvious lack of moral superiority. The relations between the clergy and the faithful have thus no deep cordiality or sympathy in Russia.

(¹) This name denotes, above all, the unfortunate Israelites, who, in these recent years of reaction have been reduced to mediæval being considered almost Pariahs.

Then, too, the churches are usually poor and plain. They are not open until the hour for service, and then are filled with people. The Russian (man or woman) in his hours of moral distress and anguish may not enter a church to collect himself and to pray. There are found none of those corners, isolated and at the same time inspiring, which are to be met with in so many of the edifices of Western Europe. On the other hand, it never occurs to any one to take counsel with the priest in moments of difficulty, because the orthodox clergy has so little prestige, and is so little respected. The priests, on their side, never go into the different families to speak words of kindness and consolation.

In consequence of this series of circumstances, the Russian is but moderately in sympathy with his national Church. There are millions of peasants in the country who might pass as utterly indifferent in matters of religion. Nor is the Russian woman more religious than the man. This is no more true of the lower than of the upper classes. It is never in Russia, for example, as it often is in France or Italy, where the husbands may be free thinkers, and the wives very devout, and even bigoted. The priest (contrary to what is seen in Catholic countries) obtains no power through the influence of women; in general his influence in society amounts to almost nothing.

There may be observed in Russia, even among the common people, the most complete

irreverence in regard to holy things. The manner in which the peasants speak of the service and the priests borders at times upon the most biting sarcasm and the most absolute indifference.

But, nevertheless, a thousand facts bear witness that a deep religious need torments the Russian soul, even to its inmost recesses. This is proved, first, by the multiplying of religious sects. Among the Catholics in France, Austria, and Italy there are no longer heretics or "non-conformists."¹ The last Western sect, Old Catholicism, has exhibited a very moderate amount of vitality. It died out in a few years. German Protestantism, too, seems to be irrevocably fixed within the limits established at the time of the Reformation. No breath of anything new has come to break through them.

(1) There is another source of Russian non-conformity, and that is, the "Old Believers," or rather, the "Old Ritualists." In the seventeenth century the patriarch Nikon caused the text of the liturgical books which had been altered by the copyists, to be revised and corrected. Numerous persons would not adopt the corrections, and separated themselves from the official church under the name of the "Old Believers."

The Orthodox Church in Russia, as a theological and dogmatic institution, is utterly dead. It confines itself to its forms of worship and the ritual. We might say that it was supported in a certain measure by right of succession, being preserved for economic and political reasons. The portion of the Russian population which has the deepest religious needs finds nothing to satisfy them in the established Church, which has been for centuries congealed within cold and hieratic forms. The aspirations of the Russian people, then, in matters of religion, rise far beyond the established Church, and are often in hostility to it. When the priest of a village is too eager for gain, when his conduct proves a source of scandal, when revolt and indignation are excited against him, peasants then separate from their pastor and throw themselves into the sects of non-conformists, as happened in England at the time of the Reformation. Some one appears, and begins to preach new doctrines based upon his own private interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. It is thus that innumerable sects have been formed in Russia. It would take too long to enumerate them here. They have all taken as a foundation the Old and New Testaments; but later, in the course of their development, they have reached the greatest extremes. Some have returned to the forms of the primitive Church, and have no clergy. Others have become reconciled to Protestantism. Others still, by the strangest aberrations, have ended in practices which are monstrous and unnatural.¹

Whatever may be the aberrations of these sects, the intensity of their religious life is very great. One finds, too, among their adherents all the admirable qualities of the

(1) Those, for example, of the "Skoptzi," a sect which is founded on a literal interpretation of the twelfth verse in the nineteenth chapter of Saint Matthew's Gospel.

neophyte; an extraordinary sense of honesty, unlimited devotion, and a spirit of sacrifice amounting to martyrdom. A number of Russian sectarians has recently arrived in America. They are the "Doukhobory" (wrestlers with the spirit). They have preferred to leave their country rather than submit to the military service, which they believe contrary to the teachings of the Bible.

The Russian non-conformists are the honor and glory of their country. If anything could show the depth of power, of seriousness, of nobility, and of perseverance which exists in the Russian people, it would be these wonderful men. Unhappily the present government, misled by an immoderate love of external and bureaucratic symmetry, far from understanding that the non-conformists are the salt of the Russian earth, persecutes them in a thousand ways, which are sometimes as cruel as they are ineffectual.

Thus, after maintaining that the Russian people is one of the most indifferent in matters of religion, I proceed to make exactly the opposite assertion. And this contradiction does not spring from my own mind; it is in the facts themselves. Among an immense people like the Russians, all kinds are to be met with; sceptics as well as apostles, full of faith and enthusiasm.

V. POLITICS.

From religion to politics the transition is not so abrupt in Russia as in the countries which are non-confessional. As the United States of America is preeminently the representative of the republican form of government, Russia is the recognized representative, so to speak, of the autocratic. Thus, the political writers of almost every country have founded upon this fact a series of far-fetched opinions, and have built thereon veritable sociological romances. They have advanced the phenomenon of heredity, of the innate inclination of the race, and a thousand other factors, equally imaginary, to prove that the Russian people have been moved to absolute monarchy ad eternum. They have piled demonstration upon demonstration to show that the only form of government conceivable by the Russian mind is autocracy, and that any other people in the world might pass from absolute monarchy to more liberal institutions. The Russian people, however, can never do so, as they allege, because of a certain peculiar mentality of their own.

This assertion will not survive for a moment an examination of the facts, if one take the trouble to look at these closely and will not content himself with indulging in mere invective.

In the first place, autocracy is relatively a recent fact in Russia. The ancient Russian populations lived under the administrative of the clan. They then passed under the government of the city. The political authority of a certain region was concentrated in a central town (oppidum), which was usually fortified. The organization of the Russian city was republican. A popular assembly (the "veche"), whose conferences were rather tumultuous, gave a general approval to the measures which were proposed to it by a kind of senate. The Russian "veche" recalls, in many ways, the primitive assemblies of the Roman people in the Forum.

In the ninth century Norman adventurers tempted their fortunes in Russia, as they had previously done in England, France, and Italy. One of these Scandinavian bands, commanded by a chief named Rurik, founded the first monarchy in Russia. The monarchical principle is, then, a foreign importation into the country. All the supposed predispositions of the Russian "race" for this form of government are thus purely imaginary. Rurik, after having installed himself at Novgorod (which was, in his time, a republic with quite a flourishing trade), pursued his conquests. He descended as far as the Lower Dnieper, and made for himself a vast Empire. That is to say, he levied tribute upon different Russian cities. In accordance with the Germanic conception of that time, government was not looked upon as a public office, but as a matter of private ownership. Thus, the descendants of Rurik divided up their father's possessions as the sons of Louis le Débonnaire divided up the Empire of Charlemagne. The princes of the house of Rurik received as their share different cities, and each created for himself a sort of kingdom. But the primitive organization of the Russian city was not destroyed by the Norman invasion. Some of the towns succeeded in driving out the descendants of Rurik, and restored the republican form of government. Novgorod retained this form until 1480, Pskof until 1509.

Others of the cities kept their princes, but without conceding to them absolute power.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

The relations established between the prince and his people are not accurately known to us. Thus, in spite of the presence of the princes of the house of Rurik, the popular assemblies (the "veche") continued to exist in many of the cities. We hear of these assemblies where the prince appeared and decisions were made in common. In other places the "veche" disappeared very early. It is probable, then, that the relations between the prince and his subjects were not very clearly or distinctly determined. It appears, also, that the most diverse conditions prevailed in the different cities, and that very often everything depended upon the personal qualities of the reigning prince.

The princes of the house of Rurik disputed the heritage of the founder of their dynasty, just as the Carlovingians disputed the heritage of Charlemagne. Even as Charles the Bald reestablished, at a certain time, the unity of the Western Empire, so did several of the Russian princes reunite a number of principalities, and attempt to restore the unity of the Empire of Rurik. But this attempt was neither a very determined nor a very permanent one, and was, moreover, never crowned with very lasting success. The only thing established in a settled and permanent manner was the supremacy of the city of Kief. The prince who reigned there was considered the head of the family of Rurik, and, as such, exercised a sort of hegemony, something after the fashion of an honorary presidency. He held the title of Grand Prince. The actual authority of the Grand Prince over the other principalities amounted to practically nothing, but his moral authority, if we may so express it, did not fail to be sought after by the Russian princes, who, for a long time, disputed the sovereignty of Kief and the title of Grand Prince, which accompanied it. The dynasty which reigned at Moskow ended later by appropriating this title to itself in an exclusive manner.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Such was the situation in Russia in the twelfth century. She offered the spectacle of a series of almost independent principalities, with institutions which were badly administered but in no sense autocratic. The advent of the Mongols occurred, and modified this state of affairs.

The descendants of Rurik never completely lost the idea of the unity of their Empire. They considered themselves members of one body, and felt themselves different from both the Asiatic tribes of the East, who were usually nomadic, and the settled populations of the West (Poles, Lithuanians, Germans, and Swedes). Thus, upon the arrival of the Mongols, the princes of the house of Rurik joined together to withstand them. They made but a feeble resistance, however, in consequence of the complete absence of any unanimity in their institutions. The Russian principalities knew not how to defend themselves, and all fell under the domination of the Tartars. The Republics of Novgorod and Pskof alone succeeded in preserving their independence.

The Mongols did not suppress the Russian principalities, but contented themselves with levying tribute upon them. But, none the less, the Mongol yoke was a very heavy one, because very despotic. Security disappeared forever for the people of Russia. Delegates from the Mongol Khan were continually coming to demand the payment of new taxes. The least resistance brought down upon them expeditions which made a merciless use at every point of fire and the sword. And, further, bands of Mongol marauders constantly overran the country, and conducted forays on their own account.

A universal law of sociology receives its confirmation in the history of Russia. And this law is, that the power accorded to the central government is the direct result of the political insecurity of a country.

When the Russian populations were oppressed by the Mongols, they sought, naturally, the protection of their reigning princes. To them they looked to put an end to the incursions of the bands of marauders. The power of the princes would naturally increase from this very fact, for they must be furnished with the means of protecting the people, that is, they must have a stronger army.

Among all the Russian princes, those of Moscow (in consequence of circumstances which it would take too long to explain here) were found to best understand the protection of their subjects. Their reputation as faithful protectors spread throughout the whole of Russia, and secured for them both prestige and authority.

In the same way that the Germanic princes contended with one another over the territories in the heart of the Germanic Empire, the Russian princes waged war over those in the heart of the Empire of the Mongols. The princes of Moscow were aided by a series of fortunate circumstances. They made numerous conquests, aggrandized their state by dispossessing other princes of the house of Rurik, and became the most powerful in Russia. Their ambition increased with their power. They assumed the title of Grand Princes, and claimed again that moral hegemony which formerly belonged to the sovereignty of Kief. The princes of Moscow had difficulties also with their Mongol suzerains, and, as soon as they felt themselves sufficiently powerful, entered into conflict with them. They engaged in a number of battles, and in some were victorious.

The Russian people now began to foresee a possibility of ridding themselves of the Mongols by the hand of the princes of Moscow. They saw clearly that without a concentration of all the political power of the Russian people the removal of the Mongol yoke was impossible. They saw, too, that their safety lay in the unlimited power of the Grand Prince who reigned at Moscow. Thus, naturally, anything which increased his authority was looked upon as beneficial, while all that tended to weaken it was considered injurious, and therefore subversive.

Thus was the idea of autocracy implanted in Great Russia. It was not, as has been too repeatedly asserted, the result of an idiosyncrasy of the Russian "race." It was, quite simply, the result of certain historical circumstances. The law that political concentration is the direct result of insecurity of frontier may be demonstrated reversely by England, the exact opposite of Russia as to political institutions. The one is the most constitutional nation in Europe, the other the most autocratic. But England is, too, the country which is best protected by nature; Russia is the least so. Complete security for Russian territory was obtained only in 1881, after the defeat of the Tekke-Turcomans. Thus, only for nineteen years have the Russians enjoyed the inviolability of their political frontier, which is a natural possession of the English, thanks to their insular position. Liberty was early established in Great Britain for the reason that there has never been any necessity for conceding great military power to the king. The same may be said of the United States of America. It is their isolated situation, beyond the reach of European aggression, which has had a large share in enabling them to assume that admirable political decentralization and that personal liberty, which have contributed, in such large measure, to their prosperity. France is another proof of what I am saying. Her continental situation offers less security than that of England; thus, her organization has necessarily remained for a longer time autocratic.

The present situation in Russia is, so to speak, diametrically opposed to what it was in the past. After living for centuries under the shadow of continual Asiatic invasions, it is Russia herself who now menaces her barbarous neighbors on her eastern frontiers. Russia enjoys to-day an external security greater than that of almost any other European power. In case of a general war, Austria, Germany, and Italy might have to fight on two sides of their borders, Russia on but one. Russia cannot be surrounded. For this reason, and, thanks to the vast extent of her territory, she is, so to speak, unconquerable.

Since Russia now enjoys a security greater than that of her neighbors, extreme concentration of power is no longer necessary. It would seem as if the principle of autocracy must lose much of its prestige in the eyes of the cultured classes. And it is so to a certain extent. But in human affairs the sublata causa, tollitur effectus is not to be instantaneously applied. After an institution has lost its "raison d'être," it may still, through force of tradition and inertia, retain much of its power.

Such is the present situation in Russia. There are already many persons in the country who appreciate the great advantage of popular representation, and look eagerly for its coming. But it is well to recognize that a large number of Russians still persist, eternally as it were, in political conceptions of a totally different kind. We are not speaking of the state officials, who are afraid of losing their places, should popular control be established. These individuals are out of the discussion. They oppose the establishment of a parliament, not as a matter of principle (for in their inner consciences they recognize its advantages), but from the promptings of a purely selfish interest. The high officials who are in this category are, it is true, very influential, but I am of the opinion that their desires would not prevail, were it not that a large number of individuals among the upper class cling to autocracy on principle, and not from any personal advantages to be derived therefrom.

Every society nourishes within its breast some individuals with antisocial tendencies. It is these persons who conscientiously put their own interests above those of their country. But these individuals cannot be continuously the most powerful in the nation, for if this were so, the forces impelling toward dissolution would preponderate over the forces contributing to cohesion, and society would be dissolved.

We must thus recognize that if the autocratic principle still survives in Russia, it is because a large number of Russians consider it beneficial for their country as a whole.

The sources whence this idea proceeds are many, but they are the result, one and all, of historical circumstances.

The Russian mind has followed the same course of evolution as that of other countries. There may be observed here, to a certain extent, two of the three states of Auguste Comte, the theological phase and the metaphysical phase. This is what has happened. While the other nations of Western Europe had already received the positive phase, toward the end of the eighteenth century, Russia has not, as yet, even in our day, attained to this. And, again, this does not proceed in any way from an innate quality of the Russian race, but from circumstances purely material and social. Russia is very poor, and its population is widely scattered. For this reason, as well as many others, which I cannot now enumerate, education has spread very slowly. The number of those who are illiterate reaches the scandalous figure of seventy-eight out of a hundred. The higher education is much less widespread than the primary. Briefly, the positive method of reasoning is sufficiently rare in Russia, as yet, and the theological and metaphysical methods reign paramount. A large number of Russians are still imbued with a great deal of mysticism, and, above all, alas, with much intellectual indefiniteness. Their faculty for analysis is very feeble. They have, as yet, but a poor idea of how to class social phenomena, and to give them those clear outlines which are characteristic of the science of positivism. The Russians bring into the State the ideas of the family, and make of them an ideal which is politically hazy and incapable of realization. This ideal may be formulated thus: a sovereign, father of his subjects, governing well in consequence of his affection for them, and, in consequence of a consciousness of his duty as an autocratic ruler, towering above all the rest. The Russian mystics have a profound contempt for a parliament. They call this a low and vulgar institution, where takes place a series of compromises and bargaining between the different interests at stake. Now this sort of transaction is degrading. A government lowers itself when it condescends to such maneuvers. The Russian mystics affirm that a government, really worthy of the name, should consider the interest of the mass of the people. Only an autocrat can accomplish this mission, because he alone has no need to enter into a compromise with any one. Bargaining and the do ut des offer no temptation to him. He can accomplish the good of all without sacrificing the interest of one class to that of another.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Naturally, when the mind of the mystic rises to such dizzy heights, he loses all sense of reality. The ultimate result of such vagaries can but be an entire weakening of the society in which they are produced. It is enough, indeed, to place, for one moment, our foot upon the solid rock of positive facts, to witness the immediate disappearance of all such mirages. The sovereign cannot accomplish everything by himself. He must delegate his powers to an immense staff of officials. How is it possible for him to control their actions, so as to be assured that they conform to his benevolent and paternal designs? It is evident that the control of some of the officials by others is absolutely ineffectual. For control of any kind to be effective it must be exercised by disinterested persons, those outside, by individuals, that is, who are not officials. On the other hand, the mystics never take the pains to study accurately natural phenomena. They do not see things as they really are. From the moment when we apply ourselves to the study of nature in a positive spirit, we understand that each little atom in the universe is in a constant dynamic state. It seems to be trying to attract everything to itself. It is just the same with society; each individual is in the dynamic state in regard to his fellow-creatures. He endeavors to compass his own best welfare. It is from the union of such efforts, in opposition, some to the others, that social institutions are born. The Russian mystics make a very great mistake when they imagine that parliamentary compromises are a proof of moral debasement. They are, on the contrary, but checks and counter checks, by means of which a social equilibrium, that is to say, the greatest possible respect for the rights of the individual is maintained.

M. Pobédonostzef, Procurator of the Holy

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

Synod,¹ has recently published a series of articles which have been translated into French under the title of "Questions religieuses, sociales et politiques."² In them he gives expression to the opinion that if all the representatives of the people were saints, the parliamentary régime would be the very best kind of all. But as the representatives of the people are usually of a more than doubtful morality, the parliamentary régime is the worst. Here is an excellent example of the reasoning of the mystic. How is it that M. Pobédonostzef does not see that the argument may be turned directly against absolute monarchy? If all the officials appointed by the sovereign were perfection itself, absolute monarchy would be the best of all forms of government. Is it possible

(1) The Procurator of the Holy Synod (a sort of minister of church worship) is one of the highest dignitaries in the Russian Empire. Furthermore, M. Pobédonostzef possessed great personal influence during the reign of Alexander II., which, in a certain measure, he still retains.

that M. Podébonostzef would have us believe that it is sufficient for an official to be appointed by an absolute sovereign to ensure his being immediately clothed with all the virtues, and that the Holy Spirit would descend upon him, as it descended formerly upon the apostles? Truly, with ideas like these it would be impossible to create a positive and realistic political system, for if miracles be admitted, the whole scaffolding of the social science falls as does a castle of cards.

Many Russians have minds which are clouded and visionary, and for the reason that monarchy, with its right divine, is more to their liking than the concrete and realistic forms of a parliamentary monarchy.

Another factor which has contributed toward maintaining the prestige of autocracy in Russia is Panslavism.

From the seventeenth century, but particularly since the reign of Peter I., the sciences, letters, philosophy, and art of Western Europe have made their way into Russia. These same branches of mental activity existed also, it is true, in the ancient Muscovite Empire, but in a rudimentary form, in sad contrast, indeed, to that which emanated from Europe. Russia was as if hypnotized. She lived for more than a century and a half under the complete fascination of the West. It seemed to the Russians that never would they be able, not merely to surpass, but even to equal their models. Naturally, no human being, and no society, can live while constantly sacrificing its personality. In reality, an abdication of this kind must lead, in the long run, either to a species of mental death (in ordinary terms to idiocy) or else the vital forces must react, and come to acknowledge this personality. Now, the Russian people has far too large a share of individuality for the reaction to fail to set in. It occurred in the first half of the nineteenth century under the name of Panslavism. The too great servility of Russian thought to that of the West brought about, by a natural propensity, an excessive reaction of the national pride. The Panslavists maintained that Russia was entirely different from, and superior to, the other nations of Europe. But when it became necessary to come forth from the clouds and to indicate the positive points in which this difference consisted, the Panslavists fell back principally upon these two facts, communal property and autocracy. In certain regions of Russia, the parish lands are, at specified times, divided among the members of the rural community. The Panslavists proceeded to affirm that individual ownership of land, as was the rule in the other countries of Europe, opens the door to pauperism. It divides society into two great classes, clearly differentiated, the non-owners, devoted to incurable poverty, and the owners, who live by taking advantage of the wretched people. The fundamental principle of such an organization is, then, unjust sovereignty. And, because it is unjust, this organization is imperfect and odious. There is nothing of this kind in Russia, say the Panslavists. In consequence of the communal divisions, every Russian is necessarily a land owner. A proletariat becomes forever impossible. Contrary to that of the West, the fundamental basis of Russian society is justice. As the Panslavists, at first, could discover no distribution of land among the Western nations, they loudly proclaimed that Russia alone possessed this admirable organization, and that, consequently, she was superior to all the others.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

It is hardly necessary to state that these arrogant delusions will not for a moment bear the light of criticism. The communal ownership of land is not the exclusive privilege of Russia. It is an archaic and imperfect form of landed proprietorship which has existed everywhere, at less advanced epochs of social evolution. Furthermore, all Russians do not form part of a rural community. There are thus proletarians in Russia. And finally the mere fact of possessing the usufruct of a hectare of poorly cultivated land (and communal land will always be so) will hardly insure the comforts of life to an entire family. And, in truth, in spite of this far-famed communal ownership, the Russian peasant is the poorest and most miserable of all Europe.

But the Panslavists did not perceive all these objections, and proclaimed that communal proprietorship placed the Russian people upon a lofty pedestal of justice and brotherhood.

Beside communal ownership, the Panslavists discovered another superiority belonging to Russia. This was, that the States of Western Europe were all founded upon brute force, while Russia alone was not. The States of the West were established by Germanic warrior chiefs who had taken possession of the Roman provinces. The Franks founded the kingdom of France, the Angles that of England, the Visigoths that of Spain, and so on. But Russia was not a part of the Roman Empire;

she never suffered these great invasions. In the ninth century some Swedish adventurers, it is true, had come into Russia. But Rurik and his companions did not come as conquerors. They were invited by the citizens of Novgorod.

Thus, while the States of Western Europe are based upon military conquests, and therefore upon violence and brute force, the Russian State is founded upon the free will of its citizens, therefore upon justice, upon a purely noble and fraternal basis.

It may be understood that a military chief who had forcibly annexed rebellious populations could not govern except through fear, and in his own interest. This warrior chief never troubled himself about the well-being of his subjects. He looked upon them as a flock, to be shorn to the utmost, as a simple means of procuring for himself the greatest amount of wealth. Such a political foundation for a State being given, there was no possibility of cordial relations being established between the sovereign and his subjects. The greatest antagonism must reign between the monarch and his people. It is from this very antagonism, according to the Panslavists, that parliamentary governments have arisen. The populations being too much oppressed revolted. They exacted guarantees from their rulers, and these guarantees were what were called constitutional charters.

Quite different was the evolution of Russia, according to the Panslavists. Since the foundation of her common law is not brutal and violent conquest, no antagonism can exist between the sovereign and his subjects. The monarchs of Western Europe desired solely their own good and not that of their subjects. But a Russian autocrat who would not care for the good of his people is inconceivable, say the Panslavists. A Russian sovereign who should put his own interests above those of his subjects, would be a contradiction which is in itself quite impossible.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

It is through this kind of argument that the Panslavists have established, anew, a capital distinction between Russia and the other nations. These other reprobate nations have sovereigns who desire the unhappiness of their subjects, and who consequently cannot love them. Russia, on the contrary, is the righteous nation par excellence. Her sovereign wishes only the welfare of his subjects; he loves them, he is their father. To establish the rights of the citizens against the sovereign is of some use when the sovereign wishes evil to his subjects, but to establish them when he desires their good is useless, and is to little purpose. On the other hand, to prevent the sovereign from compassing the good of his subjects is to desire ill to the nation; it is to create tendencies which are antisocial. Consequently, any attempt having for its object the limiting of the power of the monarch, being antisocial, is criminal and subversive. And, consequently, autocracy is the "Holy Ark" of the Russian nation; it is the institution which differentiates it entirely from the other nations of the West, and which places it anew upon an elevated pedestal of greatness and justice.

Thus reason the Panslavists. It is with this as with the division of communal land; it is hardly necessary to demonstrate that their arguments are not founded upon a knowledge of history and social science. In the first place, Rurik was as wholly a warrior chief as Robert Guiscard. The foundation of the Scandinavian domination in Russia is the same as that of the Norman rule in Neustria or at Naples. The princes of Moscow afterwards acquired the other Russian principalities by fire and sword, exactly as the kings of France acquired their possessions. The foundation of the Russian State is as much, then, violent and brutal conquest as that of the Western States. And, further, the Russian State is composed of a large number of heterogeneous ethnical elements, who have not all even yet received the right of citizenship. If, then, the sovereign of Russia is the father of his subjects, it is well to recognize that his affection is very unequally bestowed upon his children.

Little as the theories of the Panslavists may savor of positivism, they have, in large measure, contributed toward increasing the prestige of the autocratic idea in Russia.

Another fact which contributes to the same result is the democratic tendency of the Russian people.

Russia is a vast plain, nearly destitute of any beautiful material for building purposes. The castle, the seignioral dwelling, erected upon a hill which is visible from a great distance, built from material capable of resisting the wear of centuries, and exhibiting architectural beauties which are the pride of the district,—this kind of dwelling, it has not been possible to build in Russia. The castles on the banks of the Rhine, even when in ruins, preserve still a powerful and picturesque individuality, which renders them celebrated for miles around. The name of the Count of Rheinfels, pronounced in former times in the presence of a peasant of Nassau, would produce in his mind the idea of a very powerful noble, because the magnificent Castle of Rheinfels, of which this count was the owner, was known and admired throughout the entire region. In England, the seigniorial dwellings of some of the nobility are among the most remarkable of the architectural monuments of the country, and their owners share in the celebrity of their castles.

It has never been, and is not yet, so in Russia. The homes of the boyars were formerly of wood or brick, and almost always little remarkable in point of architecture. Then, too, the life of the nobility was not conspicuous, and made but small impression upon the people.

On the other hand, the law of primogeniture has never been implanted in Russia.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

No matter how illustrious a family, from the single fact that the title passed to all the male descendants, it might be borne by some individuals whose condition of fortune was of the most moderate. The title, for the same reason, lost its prestige.

It must be said, further, that the source of the Russian nobility is not always of the purest. It originates, for the most part, in administrative or military offices. The lowest of the peasants may enter the service of the State; if he attain a certain grade in the administrative hierarchy, he acquires hereditary nobility. But state officials receive but a moderate amount of esteem, admiration, and sympathy; and for a very good reason. This administrative nobility enjoys but a small amount of prestige. Add, further, that the nobles in Russia had for a long time been in the enjoyment of a privilege as useless as it was odious. They alone had the right to own serfs. They abused this right in a revolting manner, and very naturally, therefore, were not much loved or respected by the masses of the people.

Thus the Russian nobility had no traits which brought them out in a certain powerful relief from the other classes of society; they had neither prestige nor popularity, and for these reasons the Russian people has become democratic, and upon this democratic sentiment the few attempts in the annals of Russian history to limit absolute power have foundered. They proceeded from a small number of dignitaries in high places and a select number of enlightened people. But these chosen ones were not upheld by their immediate associates. The greater part of the governing class have ranged themselves behind the Emperor, and have sustained his unlimited power through fear of an oligarchical government vested in a small group of nobles.

These are the circumstances, which I have so rapidly outlined, that have moulded the autocratic tendencies, and even now uphold them. It may be seen, therefore, that such tendencies are the consequence of historical circumstances, and that they have nothing of the qualities which it is pretended are innate in the Russian "race."

Let us now consider the value of Russia as ζῶον πολιτικόν. We are forced to recognize, in truth, that in this respect her value is but of a moderate kind. Apart from the Emperor Peter I., Russia has produced almost no remarkable political personality. The greater part of her statesmen have been conservatives. Very few among them have been in the least progressive, or have had broad minds, together with that wonderful eagle-eyed penetration which sees clearly the aspirations and needs of the times, which dares even boldly project itself into the future. The larger number of Russian statesmen have been of a timid spirit, filled with narrow prejudices, forever taken up with an archaic ideal which history in its majestic onward march has already thrown aside among the ruins and disregarded possessions of the past. And, further, imitating in this the dull and monotonous plains of their country, Russian statesmen have been of little distinction, and have shown no personality to speak of. And if they have sometimes come out from their framework of mediocrity, it has been, for the most part, alas, through an exaggeration of their tyranny and extravagance.

From another point of view, however, it is not to be denied that the Russians possess some very valuable political qualities. One of these is a strong spirit of subordination, which causes them, the greater part of the time, to put the interests of the State above their own. There is barely an example in Russian history where the governor of a province has rebelled against the central authority of the State, and has endeavored to cut out, to form for himself from the general mass a personal domain. Russia has never offered the sad example of the egotistic and anarchical opinions which so frequently occur in the history of Poland. The spirit of strict discipline with which the governing classes in Russia are imbued has undoubtedly contributed, in great measure, to establish their dominion over so vast an extent of territory.

But to be conquerors is not everything, those that have been conquered must be governed. Now, the Russians have been much less skilful in the latter than in the former task, in consequence of some of their good qualities it may be, but, above all, because of one of their greatest defects. Russia has but a faint conception of law and justice. In this she is the exact opposite of the Roman people. It is this main defect which renders Russian domination so odious and insupportable to the people who must submit to it. A thousand circumstances concur to produce this unfortunate result. I have already said that the Russian is usually open-hearted and very generous. Rapacity, sordid avarice, dull and vindictive cruelty, enter but slightly into his character. He is hospitable able, not supercilious, much given to sympathy, and very courteous in his social relations. Because of all this, he coalesces easily with the foreign populations coming under his rule. It is because of these qualities, for example, that the Russians have better understood how to keep their supremacy over their Mussulman subjects in Turkestan than the English over theirs of India. But the Russian character is very uneven. And, further, his political conceptions are, as yet, indefinite, mystical, impregnated with paternalism. If under certain circumstances a conflict of interests arises between him and the people under his domination, he breaks out in sudden passion, and indulges in measures of extreme brutality. These measures are, then, all the more surprising to the population, because they are so accustomed to indulgence and good nature. Then, when the moment of anger has passed, the Russian unbends, comes to himself again, and without always repealing his unrighteous acts, he allows them quietly to fall into desuetude. A régime of this kind is of all orders the most precarious for those governed, and consequently most intolerable. The populations under Russian subjection, being never able to foresee from what quarter, in the minds of their masters, the wind may blow, live in continual anxiety and constant apprehension. Beside the fact that this is in the highest degree disagreeable for the governed, it is, also, in the highest degree contrary to the true interests of the governors. In fact, with no feeling of security for the morrow, no one dare undertake those business enterprises of a more extended character which are the basis of the material prosperity of a country.

The Russian State has been established by violence, by strokes of individual authority. Thence proceeds the illusion that the renewal of these brutal attempts is the Alpha and Omega of political wisdom. Very many Russians, even among the most cultured classes, have an idea that it would be impossible to insure general prosperity unless governments were to take, at certain times, measures described in Russia as administrative, that is to say, measures which are illegal. This idea, which is securely anchored in the Russian mind, shows how refractory it still is as to any perception of true justice, and to what extent the Russian is still, after all his efforts at civilization, a "political animal," and of a very ordinary quality.¹

VI. PRESENT STATE.

After having glanced rapidly over the more or less permanent traits of the Russian nation, I should like, before finishing this hasty sketch, to add a few words upon the situation of the moment.

First of all, with reference to economics, Russia is in a fair way to accomplish an important transformation. She is passing from the purely agricultural stage into the industrial.

(¹) What is taking place in Finland perfectly sustains my opinion.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

England is the country in which this phase has attained its highest development. Out of one hundred Englishmen seventy-one live in cities and twenty-nine in the country. In Russia the proportion is more than the reverse of this: fifteen persons live in cities and eighty-five in the country districts. But in consequence of the strides which manufacturing has made, the population of the cities continues to increase. A working class is beginning to be formed. The "bourgeoisie" is growing. These movements are already plainly visible, but they are being brought about slowly. In consequence of a thousand impediments produced by bureaucratic centralization, everything in Russia advances at a snail's pace. Things have been set going, however, and, as Russia possesses vast mineral wealth (still very largely unexplored), manufactures cannot fail, sooner or later, to rise to great importance.

Another important event in Russian history is the establishment of a network of railways, which from this time forward are destined to extend over the entire country. Doubtless the Russian network is still modest, indeed, compared to that of America,¹ but such as it is, it has already produced a fairly immeasurable revolution. Russia was formerly an amorphous country. Some of her regions were practically inaccessible, because of their immense distance from the sea. On the other hand, during a certain number of weeks in the Spring and Autumn, communication ceased almost entirely. All this is a thing of the past, thanks to the railroads. These transport men and goods at one and the same time. Through this means a constant and continually flowing current of ideas is established between the different parts of Russia, and has reunited them as with an organic bond.

In spite of the frightful obstacles which over-

(¹) There were in Russia, July 1, 1900, fifty-four thousand six hundred kilometres of railroads, and in the United States, January 1, 1899, three hundred thousand six hundred and thirty-six kilometres.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

whelm them, the press and publishing trade are making great progress in Russia. Russian editions do not yield much in point of elegance to those of Western Europe. Here is another sign of the times; very expensive publications have begun to have a financial value in Russia. A Leipzig house, combined with another in St. Petersburg, is now publishing an immense encyclopædia, after the model of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." More than a million dollars have been invested in this enterprise, which, however, is very profitable. Twenty or thirty years ago, no such thing as this would have been possible. I cannot enlarge upon these matters which are not exactly in line with my subject. I mention them only to show that economic power (which is the foundation of the development of the mind) is increasing in Russia, even though slowly.

What is the present tendency of the Russian mind? In order to answer this question we must go back a few years.

THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE

The shameful defeats suffered in the Crimea, in 1854 and 1855, had shown, with the most absolute clearness, how fatal had been the ultra-conservative policy of the Emperor Nicholas I. A powerful liberal reaction set in under Alexander II. A series of beneficent reforms was the result: the suppression of serfdom, in 1861; the reformation of the courts of justice and the introduction of the jury system, in 1864; provincial self-government for the provinces, in 1865, and the suppression of preliminary censure at St. Petersburg and Moscow in the same year.

These reforms created a new spirit. Toward 1872, the Russian youth were at the boiling point. They desired to enter upon a sort of crusade to free the peasants from their ignorance. Youthful apostles went abroad over the country, preaching among the workmen in the towns theories that were liberal and more or less subversive. If the Russian government had been endowed, at that time, with even a partially clear sense of justice, it would have understood that to preach what seems to him the truth is the primordial right of every human creature. On the other hand, if the Russian government had possessed the most elementary principles of sociology, it would have seen at once that the Nihilist apostleship had no sort of chance of amounting to anything serious. Indeed, to modify the political ideas of seventy millions of illiterate men would require an enormous amount of money and immense efforts, protracted for generations. What could be accomplished by some thousands, or rather by some hundreds, of young Nihilists, spread about through the country districts of Russia? Their propaganda would quickly disappear in the vast ocean of ignorance around them, without leaving further trace than would a small brook in the Atlantic. The government had only to shut its eyes. The youthful enthusiasts would have been freed from their social illusions; and in a very little while they would have abandoned their premature attempts. This is just what did happen in many cases. Many young preachers became very quickly disgusted, and gave up their apostleship among the peasants, seeing that it could lead to nothing.

Unhappily, the Russian government had no sufficient amount of liberalism, nor of foresight. The reactionists who surrounded the noble and generous Sovereign, the great-hearted Alexander II., began to frighten him, and advised measures of merciless severity against the Nihilists. The young persons who were preaching in the country districts were arrested, put in prison, subjected to the most rigorous treatment, and, in consequence of sentences rendered behind closed doors by special tribunals that offered no guarantee of impartiality and equity, were transported to Siberia. In the face of such persecutions as these the Nihilists resisted. They transformed themselves into a secret society and opposed to the severities of the government, assassinations and outrages even more daring. Holding the Emperor Alexander II. responsible for the policy urged upon him by his advisers, they became enraged against him personally, and made repeated attempts to kill him.

In the meanwhile, the Turkish War broke out. The Russian army suffered great privations. Nevertheless, in time, they triumphed, and arrived under the walls of Constantinople. In February, 1878, Russia was breathlessly awaiting the accomplishment of her destiny and the crowning of her historical mission. For an immense majority of the Russians the war of 1877 had all the effect of a new crusade. A glorious hope had taken supreme possession of their hearts. Every moment the capture of Constantinople was looked for and the end of the Mussulman power on our continent. It would seem as if the inauspicious work, accomplished in 1453 by Mahomet the Conqueror, were about to be undone by the hand of Holy Russia. It seemed as if Europe were about to enter into possession of that eastern basin of the Mediterranean which had formerly been her most splendid domain.

Alas, how cruelly deceived were the Russian people, in maintaining these glorious expectations! Constantinople was not occupied, the Mussulmans were not driven out of Europe, and even the independence of Bulgaria was effected in but a limited and narrow way.

Discontent followed these misconceptions. The plots of the Nihilists were renewed, and aroused further exasperation on every side. The more nervous and severe the government appeared, the more did the terrorist party redouble its audacity.

Alexander II. was a monarch who was too enlightened, whose heart was too tender, not to feel that the mere civil administration is not everything in the life of a great nation. Toward the beginning of the year 1881, Russia was living in a state of extraordinary tension. Each day a change in the régime was expected. A constitution was the universal theme; and it was even said that one had been already drawn up, and that it would be promulgated before long.

Unhappily the plots of the terrorists did not blow over. The narrow-minded and stupid fanatics who led the movement appeared to be utterly blinded. They neither saw nor heard anything of what was passing around them, and pursued their vengeance against such a Sovereign as Alexander II. As ill-fortune would have it, the odious crime of the 13th of March, 1881, was successful.

This great crime was naturally succeeded by a furious political reaction, which lasted without interruption throughout the reign of Alexander III., and bore the acknowledged seal of a narrow Muscovite nationalism and of an orthodox clericalism even more narrow still. The institutions of Alexander II. were nearly all revised in the direction of reaction. Self-government in the towns and provinces was limited, the independence of the jury perceptibly restricted. The unfortunate Israelites were deprived of most of their privileges; they were excluded from the municipal councils of the cities; their admittance into the middle and primary schools, and to the committees, was restricted. They were driven out en masse from certain parts of the Empire, in which, thanks to the toleration which reigned under Alexander II., they had been able to establish themselves. The severities of the censorship were redoubled. Many of the most influential journals were suppressed. Military law was established in the large Russian towns which gave privileges to the provincial governors and the prefects of customs which were often abused.

While, about 1873, the apostle who went about the country carrying good news to the people was the most striking character in Russian life, under Alexander III., it was the "careerist" who became the characteristic type. This type, which, in France, Alphonse Daudet has named the "Struggle for Life," was represented by the young official, with no kind of moral aspiration, with no sort of ideal, seeking to obtain, by every imaginable means, the greatest possible number of material advantages. Men of this type multiplied as rapidly as weeds. A leaden gloom fell upon Russian society. People lived, from day to day, in a sad, monotonous fashion, without having even a glimpse of anything better.

Revolutionary plots grew less frequent, little by little, and finally ceased entirely, at least as far as the public knowledge extended. In any case, there were no more astounding political assassinations. This was one of the singularly happy features of the reign of Alexander III. Let us hope that the progressive party in Russia has already perceived how odious and foolish and disadvantageous it is to resort to brute force.

Alexander III. being now dead, the hopes of the liberals strongly revived. They thought that the reactionary party would, on the accession of Nicholas II., be broken up, as had happened after the death of Nicholas I. Nothing of the kind occurred. The men who had surrounded Alexander III. remained in power during the reign of his son, and the greater part of them are in power now. The course of political opinion did not change. Some reactionary measures were still taken. Nationalism in a narrow sense continued to flourish. None of the exceptional measures which had been enacted against the unhappy Israelites were repealed. Thus, apparently, everything is going on since the death of Alexander III., just as it did during his life. But, however, it is not quite that! We are conscious, in spite of everything, that the force of the reaction is blunted. It is not as yet receding; but it is, however, no longer advancing.

Russia is at the turning-point. Russian thought has become a stagnant pool. The liberals have not to a marked degree the courage of their convictions, nor do the reactionaries dare engage in any too great violence. We live from day to day, and no one knows whither one is tending. It seems even as if people were delighted not to go anywhere. Some legislative measures of very slight importance have been enacted. But no one seems to have the courage to attack the great political problems, ripe for so many years. Life formulates its imperious demands, but the government, in its inability to act, seems to wish to stop up its ears and close its eyes. Russia continues to linger along in superannuated and nearly vanished institutions, hardly worthy of the eighteenth century, and continues to be an archaic state. The breath of no powerful and generous idea seems to animate this country. Not a single man, no great character, no conspicuous personality, appears to captivate the crowd and to vibrate in the hearts. The novel is reduced to a superficial impressionism, which paints daily life exactly as it is, without in the least attempting to interpret it. It would seem as if the novelists are chiefly ambitious to reduce themselves to the level of photographic machines, and to carefully avoid all traces of an independent thought.

At this present moment, Russian society seems to be without aspiration, and with no ideal of any kind. There is not a single great question about which intellectual war is waged. The most sacred principles count but sceptics and unbelievers. It would seem as if the chosen few of Russian society (among whom, in other times, such powerful currents of thought have been produced) had lost the faculty of feeling the beating of their own heart. An atmosphere, dull and gray, pervades the whole. There is absolute stagnation.

For how long will this state of things last? Ten, twenty, thirty years? Who will be the deliverer? Who will come to drag Russian society from its dull and lifeless state? Alas, no one can answer this question.

One event alone has been as a ray of light on this dark and gloomy sky,—the circular of the 24th of August, 1898, and the conference at The Hague, which was the result of it. Unhappily, neither has this event succeeded in rousing Russian society from its torpor. Many people in Russia expressed themselves on the subject of The Hague conference with a pessimism both scornful and ironical. Furthermore, the noble attempt of the Emperor Nicholas II. has hardly passed out of the domain of theory. Russia has not disarmed a single regiment; quite the contrary. This year the number of recruits called to active service is greater than last. And Russia has also experienced a recrudescence in naval affairs, a more foolish madness even than militarism. The construction of ironclads has been resumed with great ardor.

Russia is at present going through one of the dullest and most spiritless periods of her history. The Russian people have, I am sure, too much exuberance of vital power not to react eventually. Some day the nation will resume its forward march. Of that there can be no shadow of doubt. But just now, Russia seems as if motionless, hesitating and irresolute between progress and reaction.¹

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY
AN INTERPRETATION

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY.

AN INTERPRETATION

VLADIMIR G. SIMKOVITCH

THE Russian Autocratic System has of late faced a more serious trial than ever before. The war with Japan, while diverting public attention for the moment, cannot change to any material extent the course of Russia's inner development. Indeed, it is more likely to hasten the crisis. The system is breaking down and the day when it will be abandoned ought to be a day of praise and thanksgiving, not only for the people but for the Czar too. For Russian Autocracy has brought the country to the verge of ruin and starvation, and has ruled Czar Nicholas II. himself with a rod of iron, out of a man of noble motives and high ideals making a pathetic figurehead suffering under the weight of inherited system.

Prince Ukhtomski, an old friend of Czar Nicholas II., whose patriotism and loyalty are beyond question, has summed up the situation in the following words:

“Russia is chronically starving. Pauperism increases in extent and degree, and there are neither ways nor means to stop or to mitigate the evil. Expenditure is growing on all sides and in all directions, without bounds, though the sources of productive labor are exhausted. The people in the country, young and old, labor with all their force, but all their exertions are not enough to satisfy the requirements of the state and of those who live on the labor of the peasants. * * * There is but one way towards a brighter future and that is the delivery of the people from the yoke of bureaucracy.” (St. Petersburgskia Vedomosti, November 13, 1901.)

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

But it is not bureaucracy as such, it is the specific spirit of the Russian bureaucracy, it is the point of view, the doctrinaire, sinister Byzantinism, the system of Alexander III., of Pobedonosceff, Katkoff, Leontyeff, etc., that has gradually led to the moral and material degeneration of Russia. Nicholas II., a man of an entirely different make-up, could not free himself from the established system and from the statesmen it had produced. And yet Alexander III. and Katkoff, and Leontyeff and Pobedonosceff, etc., were all, with the possible exception of Katkoff, perfectly honest men, who sincerely and unselfishly worked for what they considered the salvation of Russia. Alexander III. witnessed the terrible death of his father, the great reformer, and reaction forced him back on the severe absolutism of Nicholas I. Yet under Nicholas I. Russia was a part of Europe. Autocracy was a fact, but not a doctrine. Only under Alexander III., and after the experiences at the Berlin Congress of 1878, did absolutistic Russia feel conscious of being fundamentally different from Western Europe; feel that it might indeed have in common with some western states the divine right of kings, and yet become aware of the abyss that separated Europe from Russia.

The Slavophiles and Panslavists rejoiced over the spirit in which Alexander III. determined to govern Russia, but without cause. Only a distorted selection of points acceptable to a Czar and pernicious to a people were taken over from the Slavophile code, and these were fused with a system of government, in its spirit and origin, more Tartar than Slavonic.

What is this System? There is nobody who represents and interprets its spirit more correctly or fearlessly than Nikolay Konstantinovich Leontyeff. Leontyeff himself is often regarded as the last great

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

Slavophile publicist, though this is a mistake. He represents precisely the peculiar fusion of degenerate Slavophilism with Russian governmentalism which is the spirit and principle of the reign of Alexander III.,—present-day Russia's inheritance and "System."

Let the philosopher of the System speak for himself.¹ Let him begin with underlying principles, with his theory.

The basic principle is "Byzantinism." Byzantinism is the nervous system of Russia. It stands for something very definite. Politically it is Autocracy, religiously it is Christianity with very distinct features, which allow no confusion with western churches and with the teachings of heretics and dissenters. In matters of morals it does not share the western exaggerated notions of the value and importance of human personality. The Byzantine ideal is a general hopelessness on the subject of everything earthly,—personal happiness, personal purity, and personal moral perfection (Vol. I., p. 81). Russian Autocracy, Russian Czarism, developed under Byzantine influences. Byzantine ideas were the only elements common to such widely differing portions of the Russian Empire as Little Russia, Lithuania, and Great Russia (I. pp. 98, 99). Byzantine Christianity teaches strict subordination. It inculcates the doctrine that the worldly, the political hierarchy is but the reflection of the heavenly. There is no equality, because the church teaches that even angels are not equal among themselves (II. 41).

Christianity is the surest and most practical means of ruling the masses of the people with an iron hand. But this power only true Christianity has, the Christianity of the peasants, the monks and the nuns, not Christianity à l'eau de rose, with its talk about love without fear, about the dignity of men and the good of mankind (II. 48). Love of mankind is anthropolatry and un-Christian. The basis of true faith is fear. Everybody can comprehend fear, fear of punishment here or hereafter, and who fears is humble, and who is humble seeks authority and learns to love the authority above him (II. 268-269). And authority is constructive, is organizing. Organization, social organization, is by nature nothing else than chronic despotism, which is accepted by all in the organization; by some through love, by others through fear, or through the hope of benefit to be derived from despotism. True constructive progress lies therefore in limiting freedom and not authority (II. 288). Freedom and liberalism are what disintegrate countries. Slowly but surely they destroy their national existence. Liberalism is everywhere an enemy to the historical principles of the people, of the discipline in which the people have developed. Liberalism is everywhere negative; it is the negation of all discipline. And the more honest, the more sincere, the more incorruptible is this liberalism—the more it is pernicious (II. 37).

Freedom for freedom's sake, the rights of habeas corpus, legality, the principles of 1789, "le bien-être matériel et moral de l'humanité." * * * "Oh, these miserable ideals. These miserable men," exclaims Leontyeff. "The more sincere, the more honest, the more convinced they are, the worse, the more harmful they are in their naïve moderation, in their imperceptible progress and fatal insidiousness. It is awkward to punish them, to persecute them, to execute them. * * * Entrenched behind legal safeguards they are more dangerous than arrant knaves, against whom every country wields the sword, the penitentiary, exile" * * * (Vol. II., p. 40). Liberalism is a new idolatry that sacrifices nations, with their historical, national peculiarities and characteristics, to a new idol, to a new and strange faith in the dignity and the rights of the common European bourgeois (II. 100). The liberal is half-nihilist, but more dangerous than the nihilist, because he does not dare to fight openly. He breathes safely under the uniform of a state official, in the professor's chair, on the judge's bench and especially in the clever and cunning articles of the liberal papers, which know at the proper time how to safeguard themselves with patriotic yells, with monarchistic exclamations, so that the hiss of the serpent and his treacherous coiling may not be noticed (II. 109).

"Prepare, O honest citizens, prepare the future!" cry these liberals. "Teach your children to grumble against authorities, teach them that above all it is important to be an 'honest man,' and that a man may have any religion he pleases. * * * Teach them to call piety bigotry, and to object to religious fanaticism, teach them that devotion to the Czar's service and respect to superiors is servility. * * * Teach them not to care "en principe" for offices and decorations. * * * Prepare, prepare the future! Send immediately anatomical atlases to the public schools, so that the children of the peasant, these citizens of the beautiful future, may learn soon that there is no soul in a man, and that everything is nerves and nerves * * * (and if there is nothing but nerves—why should they go to confession, or obey the policeman?) * * * Take special care that common people should not think that the earth stands on three whales!' * * * Oh, refined, slow poison is more terrible than fire and sword" (II. pp. 44-45).

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

All such doctrines, such innovations have to be nipped in the bud, otherwise they are victorious, declares Leontyeff. Their positive side for the most part remains a castle in the air; their destructive activity unfortunately too often achieves its negative end.

For the perfect destruction of what is left of the former social organization of Europe there is no need for barbarians, for a foreign invasion. The further spread of the religion of Eudaimonism, with its device, "Le bien-être matériel et moral de l'humanité," will accomplish it! (I. 183).

Thus the general profession of faith of the Russian interpreter of Autocracy is clear, and it might as well be pointed out that all his opinions were those also of Katkoff, Pobedonosceff, as well as of the late Emperor Alexander III. Let us now penetrate a little further into this doctrine that has for over two decades ruled Russia.

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

The Russian Czar by his authority and according to the fundamental laws of the Empire has the right to do everything except to limit his authority. The Autocrat cannot cease to be an autocrat (II. 164). Anything that the Czar does is good and legal. His doings cannot be judged by the merits of the case; the pleasure of the Supreme Authority, the Czar, is the supreme criterion. He who does not see this and cannot understand it, may be in the circumstances of his private affairs an honest man; but he is not a true Russian (II. 51). The Manifesto of Emperor Alexander III. of April 29, 1881, was a true Russian Manifesto. In the face of the whole of constitutional Europe and the whole of republican America it declared that Russia did not intend to live any longer with somebody's else brains, and that from now on Autocracy would rule in Russia supremely and fearfully ("grozno"); even a dream of a constitution would not be tolerated (I. 283). The duty of the conservative elements is not to be ashamed of calling themselves reactionaries (II. 79), because a reaction is necessary in Russia. There has been too much freedom. A violent rule is what the country needs. Violence, when there is a doctrine behind it, convinces many and conquers all (II. 80). A violent rule is what the true Russian ought to love and the Russian peasant does so; he likes officials that are brilliant, bold, hard, even harsh. Bishops, generals, military commanders not only are esteemed by the peasant, but please and appeal to his Byzantine feelings. * * * He loves decorations and looks at them with an almost mystical respect. * * * But the present nobility! Even a Gambetta and a Bright would appeal to them more than a Muravieff or Paskevitch (II. 130). The higher classes are already infected. Russia is surrounded with this liberal pest. And immediate action must be taken against equality and liberalism. * * * Russia must be kept frozen that it may not grow putrid (II. 86). Russia's illiteracy is therefore Russia's good fortune (II. 9). Since the Crimean War everything has tended to Europeanize Russia, and if she has been saved from this fate it is due to the common people and to a large extent to their illiteracy. But let a man dare straightforwardly and sincerely to doubt the value of public schools! Let a man say that it is still very questionable if it is necessary or truly useful to teach the people, the liberals would laugh at him. But is it really advisable to propagate among the people European notions, tastes, ideals, prejudices, and terrible mistakes? (II. 133).

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

Almost as pernicious as the schools are the new courts of justice as established by Alexander II., say the autocrats. They have undermined all authority. They have publicly attacked and convicted statesmen, abbots, barons, generals, mayors of cities, and men and women of quality. * * * And the public was glad. The introduction of the new courts and the jury system was an extremely radical step, and to maintain an equilibrium the judges ought to interpret the new institutions properly, and favor the older elements, the generals, the abbots, the noblemen, the fathers and mothers, as against the younger and weaker elements. The weaker element may soon become too strong! We must not disaccustom the people and the youth to obedience; it is against the spirit of Greek Orthodoxy, in which the Monarchy has grown up. Without talking much about it publicly therefore, the present courts must be modified (II. 136-142). —It may be remarked here, by way of footnote, that this has indeed taken place.

The great cardinal problem for Russian interior administration, as well as for Russian foreign policy, is how to weaken democracy. "How to weaken, how to strangle democracy, Europeanism, liberalism in all countries—that is the question!" (I. 301). Whosoever wishes Russia well must desire the ruin of western civilization and of the foremost nations representing this civilization. This western civilization is already going to pieces, but it has not yet lost its charm for the majority of the cultured people of Russia, who are still naïve enough to believe in "democracy and the welfare of humanity" (I. 305). On the suppression of liberalism depends the outcome of the solution of the Eastern question—this is another opinion of Leontyeff, who was a great authority on Eastern affairs, having spent over ten years in Turkey in the Russian diplomatic service.

Panslavism is a necessity, continues the expounder of Autocracy, but if Greek-Orthodox Panslavism is salvation, liberal Panslavism means ruin, and ruin first of all for Russia! (I. 267); because all the Slavs outside of Russia are Europeans and liberals. If Greek Orthodoxy is still strong in the East it is due to the Turks. Turkish oppression was all that preserved the Balkan Slavs from the destructive influences of European liberalism.

Russia's true national policy cannot be based on purely racial considerations. It is the spiritual idea that is Russia's strength, and this idea is Greek Orthodoxy and Autocracy. One may talk anything "for Europe," but one must think logically and clearly for one's self. The existence of Turkey is beneficial to Russia so long as she is not ready to take its place on the Bosphorus. A Pasha is better than a Greek democratic Nomarch (prefect); the Pasha is more autocratic, more statesmanlike (II. 255). Racial sympathies with the Slavs should not mislead any Russian. As a matter of fact it may as well be pointed out that among all the Slavonic nations, says Leontyeff, Russia is the least Slavonic. Russia is different in her history and her composition, different psychologically and intellectually, from all other Slavs. "Russia is the most easterly, the most, so to say, Asiatic Turanian nation in the Slavonic world, and she can develop quite independently of Europe. Without this Asiatic influence of Russia the other Slavs would soon become most miserable continental Europeans and nothing else, and for such a miserable end it is not worth their while to 'shake off their yoke' or for us to undertake self-sacrificing crusades" (I. 285). In the Russian make-up are strong and important characteristics that resemble the Turks, the Tartars, the Asiatics rather than the southern and western Slavs. Russians are lazier, more fatalistic, more obedient to authority, more good-natured, more recklessly brave, more inconsistent, and infinitely more inclined to religious mysticism than Servians, Bulgarians, Czechs, or Croatians (I. 284).

The tendencies of the Southern Slavs are evil; worse even than those of the French. The French nation has at least checking traditions. It still has royalists, ultramontanes, aristocrats, feudal traditions, that keep it from a democratic disintegration. The Slavs, on the other hand, are throughout liberals, constitutionalists, democrats. They have no ground under their feet that develops men of thought and authoritative conservatism (I. 307). But is it not Russia's great destiny to unite all the Slavs? This destiny is a dangerous burden, it is a sad necessity; it may mean the downfall of autocratic Russia exchanged for God knows what. The Slavs are fundamentally different from old Russia of the Kremlin of Moscow. Take Bulgaria, for instance. Its cultured classes are of the most common

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

European liberal stamp. And what harm these cultured Bulgarians have already done to Russia and their own people! No, Bulgaria is not misguided: it is calculating and bold, it is a fatal and dangerous nation!

Why then unite ourselves with these nations that are to such an extent liberal and constitutional? Why bother Turkey, which by its very existence is so useful to us in checking this great European pestilence of democratic progress! (II. 67). And this last Turkish war * * * the Russian army crossing the Danube, the Russian army passing the Balkans. * * * The victorious army standing before Constantinople. * * * And yet it did not enter it, it did not occupy it! It looks like an evident weakness, like a blunder. * * * But it was, as God views it, right. "In that year we were still unworthy to enter there, we should have spoiled everything. * * * We were then still too liberal!"¹ (II. 261). The final repulsion of the Turks is necessary, but in taking their place we ought not to have in view the "liberty" of the Christians, but their organization. And we must, therefore, by all means clear our own as well as their minds from all sorts of constitutional and liberal likings, customs, and tastes. Otherwise we shall ruin our own future as well as the future of the East. And when the time comes to expel the Sultan, we shall not expel him because he is an autocratic Asiatic monarch—well for us that he is—but because he has become too weak and cannot longer resist the influences of liberal Europe. But Russia can resist them if it wants to! Russia has proved that it can. It proved it by the Manifesto of the Emperor Alexander III. of the 29th of April, 1881 (I. 282-283). And for the present

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

Russia must keep in mind the old principle—divide et impera! It is essential for Russia that on the Balkan peninsula there shall be as little as possible of state unity, of political harmony, and as much as possible of church unity, of Greek-orthodox unity. Russia's friends are the Greek Patriarchs, the Greek monks, the Montenegro warriors; her enemies, the enemies of the church, the enemies of Russian Autocracy, are the parliaments of Greece and of the Balkan States (I. 226-230).

The South-Slavonic bourgeoisie stands in the way of a Russo-Byzantian autocratic Empire. Russia has to reckon with this class and must change or neutralize it. Russia must find some powerful antidote for this miserable European liberalism. And for the time being the only and the best available antidote is the nursing and strengthening of the Greek-orthodox Church in the Balkan States (I. 230).

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

As things are now, western diplomacy is already trying to diminish Russian influence in Greece and Bulgaria, and from past experience one can foresee what would happen if Constantinople should become something like an absurd neutral city. All the motley, self-seeking, and irritable population of Christian Turkey would be left to its passions without the Russian friendly but fatherly severe "veto!" To see Constantinople a free European town is to see it directly and indirectly closed and inaccessible for Russia (I. 255).

The other danger is still greater. Russia may become contaminated, may catch the disease from the Southern Slav whom she is warming at her bosom. The Russian, like the Frenchman, may learn to love any kind of Russia, as the Frenchman has learned to serve any sort of France. But who could care for a Russia that is not autocratic and not Greek-orthodox! (II.

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

149). And because Katkoff for decades has preached this doctrine he deserves a monument during his lifetime.

But the great truth is that Russia has already caught the disease. In the bottom of their hearts the Russians are already liberal. They do not realize that it is simply a sin to love Europe (II. 306). Yes, during recent years the Russian people has shown that its character is becoming very doubtful, if not really bad. It seems that sooner or later the common people will follow the intelligent leaders. And these intelligent ones are throughout liberal, i. e., empty, negative, and unprincipled (II. 182).

What then can save a country in such a pass? The answer is inequality. The more equal the rights, the more similar are the subjects of the empire, and the more similar are their demands. Divide et impera! is therefore not a piece of Jesuitism, but a law of nature, a fundamental principle of good government. So long as there are different castes, different provinces, with different peoples, so long as the education is different in different classes of society, so long will there be still a good chance to fight democratic progress (I. 165). But if the equalizing tendencies of liberalism and the democratic spirit gain the upper hand then there is only one salvation left—and that is the conquest of new and original countries, the conquest and occupation of new territories with a foreign and dissimilar population, the annexation of countries that carry in themselves conditions favorable for autocratic discipline, an annexation that does not hurry with any deep or inner assimilation (I. 171–179). Divide et impera!

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

II.

We have presented the interpretation of the Russian system of government as firmly adhered to by Alexander III., and illustrated by all his administrative activity. The closing lines of the last chapter of Leontyeff's book throw, perhaps, some light on the occupation of Manchuria and on the causes of the present war. But the Russian people is clamoring not for Manchuria, but for its daily bread, and such safeguards of personal liberty as the Anglo-Saxons have secured in their Magna Charta.

When Nicholas II. succeeded his father, a sigh of relief went through Russia. It was expected that he would revert to the policy of his grandfather, that he would grant some sort of conservative constitution, such as Alexander II. was about to sign when he was murdered. All these hopes failed. Nicholas II. was too weak a man to take a step of any importance whatsoever. The numerous petitions of provincial assemblies of the nobility praying for guarantees of life, liberty, and property, were answered by arrests and exiles. The Czar solemnly declared on January 17, 1895, that he would rule in the spirit of his father, and no change in the system, no "foolish dreams" would be tolerated.

He has kept his word. But he did not rule, he does not rule, and Russia is drifting towards rack and ruin, still in the grip of the same all-powerful System, with a thoroughly good but helpless Czar as its first slave, and perhaps its last victim. Not restrained by a responsible man, in the hands of a motley body of advisers, who have none of the honesty and integrity and unselfishness of fanatics like Alexander III. or Pobedonosceff, the autocratic System of

Alexander III. has become more unscrupulous than ever. Bezobrazoff and Alexeyeff plunged the country into a terrible and unnecessary war, and the ministry of von Plehve managed Russia by attending chiefly to the extermination of the "inner foe"—that is, the enlightenment of the people.

The crimes of government are interpreted by foreigners as the barbarism of the people, and the fair name of Russia is disgraced throughout the world. The opinion of the average American is that the Russian people is barbarous and its government enlightened. He forgets that it is not the government, but the people, that has produced the great Russian artists, the great Russian novelists, the great Russian scholars famous throughout the world. The Russian people has produced them too, not with the help, but in spite of, the autocratic government. Were not the two greatest Russian poets, Pushkin and Lermontoff, harassed and persecuted by the governments? Did not Turgeneff live in exile in Europe? Was not Dostoyevski sentenced to death, his punishment being commuted on the scaffold to forced labor in Siberia? Was not Tolstoi anathematized, and is it not an open secret that he would long ago have been sent to Siberia were it not for the bad impression such an action might have produced on Europe?

Was it the Russian people that drowned 6,000 innocent Chinese men, women, and children in the Amoor; or was it the troops obeying with horror orders received? But what is Russia's good name to its government? As Prince Gregory Volkonski correctly says, the one thought and care of the Russian government is that the power shall not slip out from its hands.¹ This slipping out process, however, has already begun.

RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

The Autocratic System still exists in its irresponsibility, yet it is not any longer in the hands of the autocrat. The imperial mantle is already being pulled to shreds and pieces, and there is a constant scramble between grand dukes and common climbers and intriguers for the most of it. Did the autocrat of all the Russias want this war? Did he not state to the Japanese Minister in all sincerity that there would be no war? Did he not order Alexeyeff to transmit on New Year's Day to the Far Eastern troops his imperial greetings and his assurance that peace would be preserved in the Far East? Nobody doubted the good faith of the Czar, but everybody in Japan and elsewhere was convinced of the bad faith of the Imperial Russian Government, of its Machiavellian, sixteenth-century methods of diplomacy. And the world is tired of it. Honest, straightforward methods in international dealings may weigh on some governments as a nightmare, but they must conform to them nevertheless.

And now to the last—we hope the last—great crime of the Autocratic System. For what is Russian blood now sacrificed and billions of rubles wrung from the starving Russian people, wasted on the fields of Manchuria? Does the Russian people need Manchuria? Not in the least. Even such expansionists and nationalistic papers as Suvorin's "Novoe Vremya" and Prince Ukhtomski's "St. Petersburgskia Vedmosti" were bitterly opposed to it. But who cares for national interests, when personal are at stake! In Corea a company formed by a couple or more of grand dukes and some higher bureaucrats has obtained valuable lumber and mining concessions—a sufficient cause for declaring northern Corea under the Russian sphere of influence.¹ As to the Manchurian adventure, everybody in Russia knew perfectly well and talked freely about this new promised land for official thieves. It is estimated that about three-quarters of the hundreds of millions appropriated for the railroads, the new commercial cities, the ports, etc., were stolen, and the money went high enough up to interest a powerful element of the autocratic administration in perpetuating this new Eldorado.

Already, in the beginning of 1902, Professor Migulin of the University of Kharkoff,¹ a very conservative man and an expert in railroad finance, called attention to what was going on in Manchuria. The railroad afforded no technical difficulties whatsoever, the Chinese coolie labor used in its construction was the cheapest in the world, the material was imported duty-free. And yet the laying of rails alone, not counting equipment, cost of stations, platforms, etc., cost the government more than 152,000 rubles pro verst, that is, about 230,000 rubles a mile!¹ Professor Migulin then also pointed out that Manchuria, on account of its extremely cheap coolie labor, is a place entirely unfit for Russian colonization, and likely to kill agriculture and colonization in the Russian Amoor region, since Russians cannot compete with Chinese wages and the low price of agricultural products.

Prince Ukhtomski, the president of the Russo-Chinese Bank, and formerly an intimate friend of Nicholas II., in an interview granted to the correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," did not hesitate to acknowledge that the cause of the war was "graft."

(¹) The Manchurian railway cost the Russian people $115,000 per mile, while the average cost of an American railway in the Western plains is $13,000 to $15,000 a mile. The inspecting engineer for the U. S. Government estimated, in 1887, the cost of reproduction of the Central Branch of the Union Pacific R. R. at $20,040 a mile ; and it must be remembered that in the intervening twenty years the track and roadbed had been put in a much better condition than at the time of original construction. RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY

"Whose fault is it, in the opinion of Your Highness, that affairs have taken such a course?" he was asked.

"In the present episodes the fault is entirely with Japan, which wants the war, is prepared for the war, which hates Russia and is full of warlike enthusiasm. But in general, of course, such a situation would never have arisen if we had adhered to a policy of civilization rather than to promoters' politics."

"What do you mean by promoters' politics?"

"Oh, there are plenty of people interested in the innumerable millions appropriated for railroads, etc. The 'Chunchuses' (Manchurian brigands) and the 'rainstorms' have so fantastically complicated the work, so fantastically increased the expenses, that really, without being particularly suspicious, one cannot help seeing how things were managed there."

These immediate appetites were the immediate little causes of the war, but not the fundamental cause. The great cause is pointed out by Leontyeff. It was the thirst for the Asiatic continent, which carries in itself conditions so favorable to a perpetuation of the Russian Autocracy in sæcula sæculorum. Manchuria, with its millions of strong, warlike people, means a tremendous additional strength, a great step, in the realization of this dream.

And will this dream be realized? Certainly not in the light in which the Russian Autocracy sees it. Theoretically it may be a very pretty scheme of checking the progress of Russian civilization, with the help of Cossacks, Turkomen, and Manchurian hordes. But the time element was entirely left out of consideration. It takes no prophet to foresee that the Russian people will finish with the autocratic régime long before it possibly can take a new lease of life in Asia. The present war is only hastening the crisis. Even such an optimistic and stanch advocate of Autocracy as Prince Meshcherski takes up with the rôle of a Cassandra, and declares that he does not expect the war to be a beneficial thunder-storm that will clear the atmosphere for the Russian Autocracy. On the contrary, no matter if Russian arms are eventually victorious, a terrible economic decline is bound to follow, when all the little rivulets and channels will unite in a sea of general dissatisfaction.

Then, we may confidently add, the real regeneration of Russia will begin.

THE SLAVS

THE SLAVS.

PETER ROBERTS

WHEN a Slovak priest was asked: "What is the meaning of the word Slav?" he instantly replied, "Glory," and added, "In all churches wherein the Slavs worship, Slava Bogu (glory to God) is chanted, and Slava is the same word as Slav."

This is the interpretation commonly accepted by the majority of the race. Scholars support this view by affirming that the root from which the word is derived signifies "intelligence" and that Slav means "the intelligible people." Others, however, derive the word from a root signifying "to call," and affirm that Slav means the "called ones"—those who are commanded; that is, serfs and slaves. The former interpretation represents the pride and expectation of the

Slavophiles, who believe that their race is providentially destined to lead the world in civilization, by preserving and perpetuating the Christian faith, by establishing law and order, by enforcing obedience to authority, and by realizing the full fruition of forces of progress which are now arrested by the senility of European nations who stand at an open grave wherein the glory of extinct kingdoms is buried. The latter interpretation represents the sentiments of the Slavophobs, who believe that no good has ever come or ever will come from the Slav, because its sons are the arch-corruptionists of the Christian faith; the uncompromising foes of democratic institutions; the destroyers of the inalienable rights to freedom of thought and of conscience; and the greatest hindrance to the onward progress of that civilization which has done so much for the peoples of Europe. Both positions are those of extremists, and each is wide of the mark chalked out by the judgment of history. This article is a study of the Slav's (I) Historical Development, (II) Racial Characteristics, (III) Recent Progress.

I.

The Slav, in the family of nations, belongs to the Indo-European stem, which comprises the Asiatic and European Aryans. The European branch separated to north and south; the former comprised the Germanic and the Letto-Slavic peoples; the latter, the Greeks, Italians, and Kelts. The Letto-Slavs were separated into Letts and Slavonians. The Slavonians are divided into East, West, and South Slavs. The East branch comprises the Great Russians, the White Russians, and the Little Russians; the West branch, the Slavs who live on the Elbe, the Wends of Lusatia, the Poles who dwell in the extinct kingdom of Poland and in Galicia, the Czecks in Bohemia and Meringia, and the Slovaks in the northern principality of Hungary; the South branch comprises the Slavs inhabiting the southeast portion of the Alps in Austria, the Bulgarians of the Danube, and the inhabitants of Croatia, Servia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Moldavia, and Slavonia. All these people do not speak the Slavic language. Those on the Elbe have been Germanized, those of Moldavia and Slavonia have been Romanized, and many in the Turkish empire are zealous Mussulmans. The Bulgarians—a people of Ugrian origin—have alienated their tongue more than any other branch of this great race, while the Polish language contains many foreign elements. Nevertheless, the vast majority of Slavs speak the ancient Slavic language, or dialects of the same, and an educated Ruthenian said that he had little difficulty in conversing with representatives of the 100,000,000 Slavic peoples. At the head of these millions stand the Great Russians, whose language in magnificent prospect rivals that of any race and whose dignity and strength admirably "fit it to be the tongue of an imperial people."

No date can be fixed for the coming of the Slav to Europe. In the table of nations given by Herodotus (450 B.C.), a tribe, the Budini, is described as having blue eyes and blonde hair. These people, with considerable probability, have been pointed out as the ancestors of the Slavs. Pytheas (200 B.C.), the Massilian, spoke of the Germanic tribes but not of the Slavs. Tacitus (100 A.D.) and Ptolemy (150 A.D.) spoke of the Wends—a name given the Slavs by the Germans. The first time the word appeared in history was in the work of the Gothic historian, Jordanes (600 B.C.), who mentioned the "Sclavini et Antes" among the unsettled peoples of Eastern Europe. The Teutons preceded the Slavs on the Conti-ment; the former first settled on the shores of the Pontus, and, moving westward over the highlands of Central Europe, settled between the Vistula and the Elbe; the latter, moving in the same direction from the shores of the Caspian Sea, settled between the Dwina and the Vistula. The Teutons, following the rivers emptying into the Atlantic Ocean, became the heirs of the civilization of the Mediterranean races and found their sphere of influence in hospitable regions; the Slavs, following those emptying into the Arctic Ocean, settled among peoples living in the hunting and fishing stages of civilization, and found their sphere of influence limited to inhospitable regions. These facts, in part, explain the Slav's slow progress in civilization as compared with the Kelts and Teutons.

The plains of Russia, from time immemorable, have been the scene of Mongolian and Tartar invasions. Over these the nomad Slavs wandered, but little is known of their movements during the first three centuries of the Christian era. At the close of the third century, Slavs were found in the Balkan peninsula, where probably they were transported as prisoners of war. Two centuries later, they drove out the dwellers in the plains east of the Carpathian mountains, and, in the following century, Heraclius, the Byzantine Emperor, employed them as a bulwark against the incursions of the Avars. Slav nomads, at this early date, proved themselves brave warriors. When a company of them was brought into the camp of the Khazars, a sage prophesied: "These men's swords have two edges; ours have but one. We conquer now, but some day they will conquer us." The prophecy was fulfilled in the tenth century. In the seventh century the Serbs left their home on the Carpathian mountains and joined their brethren in the Balkan peninsula. The Bulgarians, settling about the middle of the seventh century in Moesia, conquered the Slavs of the Balkans, and for three centuries held their own against the Huns, the Turks, and Byzantium. The Slavs of the south must have played a leading part in these conflicts, for by the ninth century they had so Slavonized their conquerors that the old Finnish tongue was abandoned and the Slavic language adopted in divine worship. In the eighth century, two streams of Slavic colonizers moved eastward to the western plains of Russia. The northern left the territory watered by the Elbe and Vistula, the southern that of the Danube. These, living in democratic communities, were soon to consolidate and enter into the arena where the nations of two continents wrestled for the mastery.

THE SLAVS

Thus, for five hundred years, when Finns and Norsemen, Huns and Avars, Mongolians and Tartars, shifted the nations of Europe as the simoon the sands of the desert, the Slav maintained his individuality, preserved his type, and kept his language essentially intact. His wanderings brought him to the Elbe on the north and to Austria and Greece on the south. As the tenth century dawned, he stood in the vigor of youth on the plains where kingdoms rise and wane: "The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him and persecuted him, but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong."

THE SLAVS

Each of the Slav groups now consolidated. The Serbs formed a kingdom in old Illyricum and a part of Moesia; the Poles on the highland where the Vistula and Oder rise; and the Russians in the vicinity of Lake Ilmen. Rurik, the Norseman, led the Russians, and, by conquering the neighboring Slav tribes, firmly established a dynasty of kings who ruled for six centuries. His son and grandson extended their kingdom southward and engaged the armies of Byzantium, and for the first time a Muscovite king coveted the Golden Horn. Igor did not succeed (941 A.D.) in capturing Constantinople, but in the following year a treaty of peace was made and signed by fifty of his chiefs, among whom three were Slavs. To the southwest of the kingdom of Russia, a rival rose under the leadership of princes of native blood. Located on an undulating plain, having no natural bulwarks against the onslaught of powerful rivals, the rise of the Polish kingdom was more precarious than that of its kinsmen to the north. On the west were the Germans; on the north the Scandinavians; on the east, the most dangerous foe of all, the Russians. With these foes Poland struggled for eight hundred years, and at last was ruined by the selfishness of its aristocracy, the intrigue of its ecclesiastics, and the serfdom of its peasantry. The Serbs in Illyricum and

THE SLAVS

Moesia established a kingdom which lasted four centuries. The leadership was taken by one of the Zupans into which the territory was divided, and, notwithstanding the close proximity of Byzantium, its power in the twelfth century enabled it to compete successfully with the Greek emperors. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the Serbs maintained their independency against the attacks of Mongols, Huns, and Greeks. The unhappy people, however, were destined to lose their independence. After a brief taste of civilization, they were sent back to the yoke of their ignorant and unsympathetic Ottoman masters by the complete defeat sustained at the hand of the Turks in "the field of blackbirds" (1389). For four hundred years did the iron yoke of the Mussulmans rest heavily upon the Serbs, and Servia lost the best of her sons, who migrated to escape the tyranny of the Turk. In 1804, this branch of the Slav race rose in rebellion and was finally saved from complete defeat by the intervention of Russia.

During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the kingdoms of Poland and Russia paid tribute to the Mongol, and, although they escaped the fate of their brethren of the south, their suffering was second only to that of Servia. Tartars swept over their plains, burned their towns and villages, and forced their princes to bow the knee to the Great Khan. While the struggle went on, the so-called Christian nations of Europe looked on complacently, and, while the Slav was buffeted, took no interest in the war except in so far as their own safety was threatened. After two centuries of bondage, the Slavs of the east and west threw off the Mongol's yoke, but for another two centuries this people formed the bulwark of Europe against Tartar invasions, until at last the pious John Sobieski and his Poles, in 1683, came to the relief of Austria, and drove the Mongols from the continent. He, as Charles Martel before him, saved Christendom from the Mohammedans, and was greeted from the altar of the cathedral of Vienna, wherein kings and princes returned thanks for the victory, with the text: "There was a man sent from God whose name was John." The Poles made themselves a vicarious sacrifice and were rewarded by Christian Europe with wounds which finally proved fatal. The craftiness of the house of Hapsburg, the jealousy of their Teutonic neighbors, the invasion of the Scandinavians, the rivalry of Russia, were more than Poland could resist. Weakened by foes from without and torn by internal dissension, Poland became the land of war, of tumult, and of plunder. Its streets were bathed in blood, its fields were burned by its own sons, and the tramp of foreign armies sealed the doom of the second kingdom of the Slavic peoples. Its fate was determined in 1772. Russia took the lion's share, subdued the arrogance of its nobles, established peace and order in the land, and made possible the economic advancement of this brilliant branch of the Slavic race.

THE SLAVS

The fall of Poland left Russia the sole representative of the Slav among the kingdoms of the earth. The Muscovites waxed strong and built their kingdom upon the wrecks of democratic communities. The nomads of the south gave them considerable trouble. One of their chroniclers says: "They burn the villages, the farmyards, and the churches. The land is turned by them into a desert, and the government fields become the lair of wild beasts. Many people are led away into slavery; others are tortured and killed, or die from hunger and thirst." Another says: "In the Russian land is rarely heard the voice of the husbandman, but often the cry of the vultures fighting with each other over the bodies of the slain, and the ravens scream as they fly to the spoil." The Khan of the Crimea, the Cossacks of the Don, the Turks of the Ottoman Empire, made periodical incursions for booty and for slaves, and for centuries the Slav's sword saved Europe from barbaric hordes. Russia is called the "nation of the sword," and well it was for the continent that its sons could wield it so mightily, for no other means was effectual to check the advance of the Tartars, whose torch and scimitar wrought untold havoc. The bloodthirsty ruler, Mahmoud, with the instincts of the savage, revelled in shedding the blood of Christians, and nothing but the merciless Slav could bring the merciless Turk to reason.

But at home the Slav's hand was not less gentle. The boyars sometimes rose and slew their princes. Their conduct gave rise to the proverb, "If the prince is bad, into the mud with him." No Tartar ever witnessed more bloody conflicts than those waged by Ivan the Terrible in Novgorod, in 1570. The Slavs used the iron hand, but the work they had to do and the material upon which they worked required the soldier more than the priest. Peter the Great, with his master mind, found it necessary to drown the arrogance, prejudices, and superstitions of his nobles in blood. Not till the middle of the eighteenth century was the Slav recognized among the powers of Europe, when the light of western civilization began to stream through the window opened by the greatest of the Muscovite Czars on the Baltic Sea. In the nineteenth century, the Slav stood forth as the champion of Christians who groaned under Mussulman's misrule. Christian Europe stood aloof when their co-religionists were mercilessly slain by Ottomans, but the Slav compelled the Sultan to honor the conscience of their brethren, and, releasing Moldavia, Wallachia, Servia, and Bulgaria from the Turkish yoke, caused a new era to dawn for them. Russia's work in Turkey is one of the brightest pages of nineteenth-century history. The Slav, regenerated by the leaven of new ideals, has earned the distinction, on more than one occasion, of being the restorer of law and order among the kingdoms of Europe. The Crimean War rudely awoke him from his self-confidence, pride, and ignorance, and, as the smoke of conflict cleared, he saw a brighter day dawning, which the emancipation of the serfs, in 1861, proclaimed to all the earth. Russia, after a thousand years of warfare and strife, is to-day a worthy leader in the Pan-Slavic movement, whose ideal is the hegemony in the industrial, commercial, and religious affairs of the world.

THE SLAVS

II.

Is the Slav capable of this?

The average Slav, anthropologically considered, is as good an animal as the average member of any European people. The dolichocephalic Saxon looks with prejudice upon the brachycephalic Slav, but all cranial forms possess only an artificial value and tell us nothing respecting the several grades of mental power contained within. If we take cranial capacity, which most distinguishes man from the apes, and study the measurements obtained from the researches of A. Weisbach and Hermann Welcker, we find that they are not unfavorable to the Slavs. The average weight of the brain of Germans is 1314.5 grains; that of Magyars 1322.8; that of Slavs, 1325.2. If it is claimed that the capacity of the skull is of more importance in ethnology than the weight of the brain, the Slavs need not be ashamed of this test. The average capacity of the skull of Kelts is 1459 cubic centimetres; that of Magyars, 1422; that of Germans, 1470; and that of Slavs, 1478. Again, if we take the discovery of Calori of Bologna, we must believe that the brachycephali have heavier brains than the dolichocephali, which is decidedly in favor of the Slavs, whose index of breadth varies from 81.6 to 85.1, that of Germans from 76.7 to 80.1, that of Kelts from 73.4 to 79.5. Thus if the capacity of the cranium, the weight of the brain, or the form of the skull, has anything to do with the future dominance of the world, the Slav's chance is as good as that of any race on the continent of Europe.

No scientist has discovered in the Slav pithecoïd features which assign him a lower place than that occupied by the peoples of

THE SLAVS

Europe in the supposed hierarchy of the races of mankind. Virchow has shown that prognathy is inconsistent with the full development of the brain, and that the prognathous type of face is almost exclusively confined to nations in which civilization appears somewhat immature. But this unpropitious position of the jaw is not more prevalent among the Slavs than among other European races. It is not so common in Moscow as in Paris, and cases of prognathy can be seen as frequently in England and Germany as in Russia. Craniologists have also shown that prognathy prevails as a rule in narrow skulls, while medium and broad skulls are mostly mesognathous or occasionally opistognathous, which fact again favors the Slav. The shortness of the upper limbs separates man from the animals which most resemble him. Carl Vogt has expressed this relation by saying that the orang can, in an erect position, touch his ankles; the gorilla, the middle of the tibia; the chimpanzee, the knee; whereas man can scarcely reach the middle of the thigh. Weisbach's measurements show that the average length of the arms of Germans is 0.469 of the length of the body, and that of Slavs, 0.467. If, finally, the bodily height and weight of the average Slav are compared with those of the average member of the European races, the result is as favorable to the former as to the latter. Snigriew, after a careful comparison of the measurements of German, Lithuanian, Polish, and Russian recruits, concluded that there was no practical difference between the several peoples. Thus, anthropologically or ethnologically considered, the Slav is not a whit behind those nations who claim a right to lead in the civilization of the world because of greater fitness to discharge the duties and obligations involved in the task.

THE SLAVS

If we compare the social and industrial life of the Slav with that of the Teuton, he must be assigned a lower place in the history of civilization. Industrially considered, the great mass of the Slav race is an elemental people, making, with their own hands, in their own homes, what they wear and use. Under the stern rule of many of the Czars, men who dreamed of making their brethren happy, virtuous, and refined were sent to exile and the scaffold. The social awakening that followed the revolution of 1848-1849 was energetically arrested by Nicholas, who substituted "the French quadrille in the place of Adam Smith." The majority of Slav agriculturalists are still in the primitive stage. The margin between the real want and the felt want of the Slav is small. The masses wear comparatively little underclothing; the favorite materials employed in native cookery are sour cabbage, cucumbers, and kvass. Eternal stillness is the character of Slav provincial life. The system of public instruction in Russia is inadequate. The paternalism of the government has been fatal to individual initiative; autocracy has strangled all attempts at constitutional government; and religious authority, while suppressing freedom of conscience, has tolerated gross superstition and buried the essential principles of morality under a weight of sensuous forms and mysterious rites. The emigrant Slav in an American police court considers the most barefaced and patent falsehood as a fair means of self-defence, and many of them have very lax ideas as to the rights of persons and property. These specks and blemishes are visible, but the student will patiently study the phenomena and seek the deep-rooted causes by which these specks and blemishes are produced rather than make sweeping generalizations. Catherine said of Rivière, the French physiocrat: "He supposed we walked on all fours, and very politely he took the trouble to come from La Martinique to teach us how to stand on the hind legs." Teutons and Kelts have manifested the same proud contempt for the Slav in modern times, giving little thought to the fact that he is the child of a different civilization from our own.

The Slav has lived under the iron hand of autocracy. Outside the Mir he has no voice in the government. It is second nature in him to obey. When Teutonic kings had to struggle with municipal institutions to prevent them from becoming too powerful, the Czars had to struggle to prevent them from committing suicide or dying of inanition. The Slav, accustomed to lean on the arm of autocracy, has not advanced on the road of progress in a smooth, gradual, and prosaic way as Teutons do, but rather by a series of unconnected and frantic efforts as the whim possessed the autocrat.

Slavs regard the state as an entity wholly distinct from themselves and having interests entirely different from their own, and the state never hesitated ruthlessly to sacrifice the interests of the individual when its own were involved. Under a state policy that knows no change generation after generation, the boundaries of the empire have been extended, so that to-day the Czar's sons are seen on the shores of the Arctic and Pacific oceans, on the frontier of China and in Central Asia, the embodiment of patient endurance, of dogged resistance, and stoical fortitude. Fed on sour cabbage, soup, black bread, dried fish, and weak tea, the Slav soldier is patient, good-natured, and never complains. On sea or land he is obedient, tenacious of purpose, self-confident, and contented; is never anxious for the morrow, for his plans embrace generations yet unborn.

The results are that in Turkestan and in

THE SLAVS

Central Asia, the Slav has wrought wonders. He has established law and order where anarchy once prevailed; the wilderness has blossomed under his rule; avenues of commerce have been opened and the nations of the earth enriched; the barbarian is on the highway to industrial efficiency, for the robber chief is suppressed and the tillers of the soil find their persons and property safe. In Siberia, the Slav is at his best. This former land of convicts, by the industry and thrift of the colonizers is become one of the greatest wheat granaries of the world. On the slopes of the Pacific, the robber bands who defied Mongolian rulers have been annihilated, and Chinese and Slav farmers feel perfectly secure under the protection of the Muscovite. Peking has been brought within two weeks' journey of Moscow, and the Russian steamers between Odessa and Port Arthur afford facilities for travelling and commerce second to none in the world. At home the same strong hand guides the destiny of the Empire. By the dictum of the Czar 40,000,000 serfs were liberated. It was the greatest reform of the nineteenth century and effected without a revolution. The nobility were deprived of their land, the serfs given freehold claims, and the conditions of the transaction laid down by the Autocrat of St. Petersburg. A ukase establishes the gold standard, erects a tariff wall around the empire, fosters infant industries, takes under its protection the vodka shops of the empire, curbs the selfishness of employers and the arrogance of employees, and makes industrial war a crime. A ukase prohibits the black clergy from deviating from the rules of St. Basil, refuses permission to a Russian once within the pale of the orthodox church to depart thence, commands the white clergy to refrain from innovation, secures the laity uniformity and continuity in divine worship, plants churches wherever its children go as colonizers, and secures its Mohammedan, Roman Catholic, and Protestant subjects immunity from persecution. Paternalism is the very breath of life of the Russian Government, and if the Slav has lost individual initiative he has gained in obedience to authority; if he has lost constitutional government, he has gained immunity against the arrogance of nobles and the breed of entrepreneurs; if he has lost freedom of opinion and freedom of conscience, he has gained exemption from the tyranny of majorities, the vicissitudes of public elections, and the multiplicity of sects. Autocracy and democracy have their weak and strong points. It is not our task to decide which is the better for a nation. The Slav is the child of autocratic power and none dare say that his efficiency among the nations of the world is compromised thereby. On the shores of the Pacific, on the table-lands of Tibet, on the plateaus of Mongolia, on the broad plains of Siberia, the Slav has been a presiding genius. When he has spoken in Peking, or Cabool, or Teheran, or Constantinople, the nations of Europe have been silent and emperors taken council.

THE SLAVS

THE SLAVS

But the Slav peasant;

“A thing that groans not and that never hopes,
Stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox?”

what of him? Mr. N. T. Bacon has said (Yale Review, May, 1904, p. 53): “From our standpoint the Russian peasant is idle and good-for-nothing.” A. J. Beveridge thinks differently (“Russian Advance,” p. 319): “He it is who tills the soil and fills the factories; he who consumes the tea, drinks the vodka, pays the taxes; he who equips the army and fights the empire’s battles; he who mans the ships of Russia’s growing fleets; he on whom the whole government rests; he who holds in his breast the destiny of the Slav race." Consider the following picture by the same author (p. 304): "They (the peasants) were working at their 'kustar trades' in that short period between the cultivation of their fields and the harvest of the grain which was not yet ripe. Thus their time and labor were turned into productive industry. In tens of thousands of the little country villages * * * workingmen employ every moment of their time during the long winter months in some kind of manufacture. Not only the men, but the women and children, work at these trades." A people who in 1902 supported themselves and exported $420,000,000 worth of goods composed of 62 per cent. of grain and provisions, and 32 per cent. of raw and undressed materials, and only two per cent. of cotton goods; a people who, working at their "kustar trades" between sowing and harvest or during winter, supply about nine-tenths of the goods for domestic consumption; a people who paid in taxation for the maintenance of the imperial government $900,000,000 and manned the army and navy which guard the frontiers or protect the coast, ought to be counted good for something, no matter from what standpoint they are studied.

THE SLAVS

There are, in the United States, about a million and a quarter Slav immigrants who represent the peasant class. Whoever has studied them in the mines and on the farms, in the mills and on the wharfs, in the forests and on the rivers, must bear testimony to their daring courage, constant industry, prompt obedience, and patient endurance. Men believed a generation ago that the mining industry of Pennsylvania could not be carried on if the English and Welsh, Irish and Scotch, Germans and Americans were withdrawn. To-day, in eight shafts in the Mahanoy Valley employing about 2500 contract miners, less than 5 per cent. of them are Kelts and Teutons. The Poles, Ruthenians, and Slovaks get out the coal and the per capita production is to-day greater than it was twenty-five years ago, notwithstanding the fact that the operation requires three times the muscular effort which it then required. In 1903, over five hundred of these men sacrificed their lives in the collieries of Pennsylvania, and another army of 1500 was injured in this risky business. The Slav will work where "white men" will not; he is willing to work ten, twelve, and fourteen hours a day if he can earn high wages. He is patient and persevering, sometimes stupid and slow, but often also apt and efficient. Always the Slav is amenable to discipline, submissive to authority, and silent under difficulties. He is easily led, believes absolutely in and idolizes his leader, is easily excited, and when aroused soon forgets the teachings of civilization and falls to the unstable nature of his barbaric ancestors. Many Slavs are unclean; all drink; their quarrels and fights are fiendish in their atrocities; their standard of living is low; their social customs repugnant, and some of their religious practices are tainted with superstition. But in all this we speak as Americans, we judge as Americans, and our standard is the highest ever attained in the history of civilization. Compare the social and moral conditions of Slav mining communities with those of Great Britain as depicted in the Parliamentary report of 1866, or compare their life to-day with that found in anthracite communities in 1876 by Abram S. Hewitt: "In 1876 * * * I made a tour of inspection through the mining regions. I found terrible conditions there. I found the men living like pigs and dogs, under wretchedly brutal conditions." These were immigrants of the British Isles, and few Slav settlements to-day deserve so dark a setting.

THE SLAVS

The Moujik has many undesirable qualities. But let us remember that yesterday he was a serf who could be sold as the ox and the horse. If he ran away or dared to present a petition against his master, he was beaten with the knout or sent to the mines in Siberia. His proprietor could impose on him every kind of labor, could take from him money dues, could demand from him personal service, and could send the promising youth to the army. Is it strange, then, that these men bear in their body and mind the marks of twenty centuries of serfdom? And yet this peasant—the heir of five centuries of vassalage—is good-natured and pacific, is adaptable and imperturbable, has an instinct for organization, is an apt pupil under competent masters, is admirably fitted for the work of peaceful agricultural colonization, is long-suffering and conciliatory, and capable of bearing extreme hardships. When he is taken out of the environment where the blight of serfdom is still felt and comes in contact with foreign nations, he immediately adopts foreign ideas and foreign inventions. When freed from the trammels of hereditary conceptions, when liberated from the bondage of clannish suspicion, when once he treads the path of industrial and commercial speculation, his "go-ahead" is truly American. Practical common-sense sways the vast majority of this people. Sentimental considerations and loud-sounding phrases have very little if any place in their life. What they want is a house to live in, food to eat, raiment wherewith to be clothed. Neo-Malthusianism is not in the Slav's creed; both men and women believe that children are "an heritage of the Lord" and are "as arrows in the hand of a mighty man." Bachelors and spinsters are not found among them. In no country in Europe is the birth-rate so high as among Slavs, and medical science, in recent years, has beneficently checked infant mortality among the peasants. With the increase of material well-being, of intellectual and moral culture, refined sensitiveness and keen sympathy with physical suffering are becoming characteristics of Slavs. Slav peasantry is fallow ground for the seed of a higher civilization, and none better appreciates the light. This young giant, who "hath as it were the strength of the wild ox," and who "as a lion doth lift himself up," turns his face, radiant with hope, to the rising sun. He is conscious of a mission to perform; he shakes himself from the dust; he looses himself from the bands of his neck, "he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey and drink the blood of the slain."

THE SLAVS

III.

Signs of the Slav's progress are not wanting. Ethno-sentimental considerations are moving Slavic nobles, who have in recent times exhibited a sensitiveness to humanitarian conceptions second to none on the continent. They look upon the peasant as a brother and have few of the frailties of aristocrats. A noble's fortune is no longer computed by the number of his serfs. Priests and nobles no longer receive cruel corporal punishment with whips because of delinquencies. In 1771, Archbishop Ambrose was massacred in Moscow for attempting to enforce sanitary measures during a plague; in St. Petersburg, about the middle of the last century, a mob pelted the Metropolitan with missiles, and threw the doctors out of the windows of the hospital because they suspected them of poisoning the wells; to-day sanitary measures are instituted according to modern scientific principles; the hospitals have on their staffs some of the leading scientists of the world; and the masses gather in people's palaces, where weak tea and free entertainments are furnished. A century ago the papers of Moscow advertised serfs for sale, and a Russian who evinced any desire for travel was regarded with suspicion; to-day, the Moscow press advertises free land for peasants and Russians travel extensively. Fifty years ago only two per cent. of the peasants who joined the army could read; now 33 per cent. of them can do so. Forty years ago, two-thirds of the people of Russia had no rights which they could enforce against their superiors, and justice, when administered, proclaimed its decrees from behind closed doors. Now, the proceedings of the tribunals are public, criminal cases are tried by jury, petty cases are tried by Justices of the Peace, and the course of justice is simplified to meet the demands of the people. Frederick the Great said of the Russian soldiers, "We have to do with barbarians, who are digging the grave of humanity." A century later, General Skobelev, in the war of Bulgaria, had to command a halt and furnish carts and men to care for the babes who were thrown away by their Turkish mothers and picked up by the Russian soldiers as they pursued the foe. These are landmarks of progress.

The Slav soldier is still capable of wielding the sword with the ferocity of a Jephthah or a Gideon, but it is on the principle that it is better to cut off the hand and the foot than have the whole body cast into hell. When Skobelev sheathed his sword, in Central Asia, peace, order, and safety were established, but previous to the advent of the Russian tumult, anarchy and terrorism prevailed. Under the wise guidance of patriotic statesmen the accursed vodka shops—the breeders of drunkenness and poverty—are regulated, and the peasants are provided with tea houses where the social instinct of the Slav is met. In no European state are there more comprehensive laws relative to employers' liability than in Russia, while many of the States of the Union can well afford to learn of Slav statesmen how to regulate factories where children are sacrificed both day and night upon the altar of mammonism. The railroads of Manchuria and the Caucasus have broken down the barbarous custom of collecting transportation taxes which rendered commerce in the interior of Asia and China impossible. Under the Slavs' supervision good roads are made and model towns are built where formerly barbarous communities dwelt in filth. Wherever the Slav builds he guards against disease, squalor, and unsightliness, which are common occurrences where Mongols and Tartars dwell. The Slav peasant is slowly awakening to a realization of his independence, to a due appreciation of economic freedom, to an understanding of the rights of property, and to the market value of industry, temperance, and truthfulness. Slav statesmen proclaim the commercial value of honesty, the necessity of enterprise in manufacturing industries and commerce, the worth of new methods in production, and the markets which await the production of farms and factories. All the lessons which industrial liberty teaches, all the blessings which science and art bring, all the results which centuries of civilization realize, are brought to the feet of this youth in whose heart are stored the energies of centuries of stolid living. Give him time, and the pressure of new wants and new ideas will awaken his sleepy brain and set in motion his sluggish nerves and effect a metamorphosis which the combined wisdom of philosophers and theorists cannot effect. Lobenoff changed the face of Europe in an incredibly short time; the foreign statesmanship of Russia in far-sightedness is not surpassed by that of any other modern nation; the Slav has developed a diplomacy which equals in skill and resource that of any other people of ancient or modern times; and when the Slav peasant fully awakes to the demands of modern life, he will go forth with singing and "come again with joy, bringing his sheaves with him." Let another Peter the Great arise to lead these 100,000,000 Slavs, strong in their youthful vigor, confident that they have a mission to fulfil, and what obstacles can stand before their onward march? If they arm themselves for battle their armies will shake two continents, and the Slavophobs' worst fears will be realized. If they seek a higher victory—"the victory of Science,

THE SLAVS

THE SLAVS

Art, and Faith"—the dream of the Slavophiles in part may be realized, viz., that the Slav will restore the world, demoralized by atheism in religion and anarchy in government, to sanity, faith, and order.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA.

ISAAC A. HOURWICH

I.

Two events occurring in the year 1903 fastened the eyes of the civilized world upon Russia: the Czar's manifesto of February 26th (March 11th), on religious tolerance, and a few weeks later, the massacre of the Jews at Kishinyov on Easter Sunday and Monday.

In the preamble to the manifesto the Czar declared his "holy vow * * * to guard the ancient foundations of the Russian state," as well as his "inflexible determination to satisfy without further delay the matured needs of the state." First in order of enumeration was the need "to secure, in matters pertaining to religion, strict observance, by the authorities, of the mandates of tolerance inscribed in the fundamental laws of the Russian Empire, which, devoutly respecting the Orthodox Church as supreme and dominant, grant to all our subjects of heterodox and non-Christian denominations the freedom of observing their faith and worshipping in accordance with the rites thereof."

This solemn announcement of the Czar's "inflexible determination" to secure for his subjects the enjoyment of privileges "inscribed in the fundamental laws of the empire" admits, by implication, that "the mandates of tolerance" have not always been respected by the authorities. The need had matured for strict observance of the law by the officers of the law, and must be "satisfied without further delay." The Kishinyov massacre emphasized the point.

Religious tolerance is an elastic term. As interpreted by the Czar's manifesto, its scope is confined to freedom of worship, a strict construction unquestionably in accord both with the letter and spirit of the fundamental laws as they are. No innovations are contemplated by the manifesto, which vows "to guard the ancient foundations of the Russian state."

What is meant by religious tolerance, according to the laws of the Russian Empire, is thus laid down by the late Professor Gradvosky, of the Imperial University of St. Petersburg, an eminent authority on Russian public law:

The full scope of freedom of conscience or religious faith embraces the following tests: (a) the freedom of public worship in accordance with the rites of one's creed; (b) the freedom of choosing a creed; (c) the freedom of preaching, with the purpose of converting persons belonging to other denominations, as well as of founding a new church; (d) the full enjoyment of political and civil rights by all persons regardless of church affiliation.

The rules of religious tolerance, as expressed in the Russian law, are substantially confined to the freedom of worship.¹

(¹) A. Gradvosky, Elements of Russian Public Law, vol. i., pp. 373, 376.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

But even in this narrow sense religious tolerance in Russia is subject to very material limitations.

About one-third of the population of the Russian empire are not affiliated with the Orthodox Greek-Catholic Church. The law divides the forty-five million heterodox and non-Christian subjects of the Czar into two classes: (1) "foreign denominations," and (2) "heresies and schisms." The former, as the term denotes, represent bodies of citizens of foreign descent added to the population of the empire chiefly through territorial expansion, and to some extent through immigration. "Heresies and schisms" are religious divisions which have grown up within the Orthodox Church itself. Whereas "heresies and schisms" remain to this day within the purview of the criminal law, sound statesmanship has from the earliest times enjoined towards "foreign denominations" a degree of tolerance varying with the circumstances under which each of them came within the jurisdiction of the expanding Russian state.

By the ukase of Empress Anne (February 22, 1735), which is still the law, religious tolerance is defined to mean merely freedom of worship, but not the freedom of preaching for the purpose of making converts among Russian subjects, which is prohibited under severe penalties. Inasmuch as the established church is a part of the state, the power of the state is strengthened by the growth of the Orthodox Church. Other denominations may hold their own, but all missionary work is the exclusive prerogative of the established church. English missionaries, who, during the reign of Alexander II., endeavored to preach the gospel among the heathen natives of Eastern Siberia, were promptly ordered out of the Empire.

Until the Polish insurrection of 1863 the

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

Roman Catholic Church enjoyed the same privileges as all other foreign Christian denominations, but the leading part taken by the Roman Catholic clergy in the struggles of the Polish people for national independence called forth vigorous measures of reprisal from the Russian government. Churches were closed and church edifices converted into barracks and stables.

An incident in this repressive policy is the "conversion" of the Uniat. The Uniat, or United Greek Church, is a branch of the Eastern Church, which accepts the supremacy of the Pope though in all other respects adhering to the doctrine of the Greek-Catholic Church. The Uniat Church embraced a large portion of the White Russian people, of the former Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In order to wrest the White Russians from Polish influence, it was deemed imperative to "reunite" them to the established church. Missionaries were sent out among the Uniat, and wherever persuasion failed of effect were reinforced by the police and the military. Uniat priests who objected to joining the established church were imprisoned and banished; their churches were placed in charge of orthodox priests, their parishes were officially declared "reunited," with the result that those who persisted in their allegiance to the church in which they were raised were treated by the law as "apostates" from Orthodoxy.

II.

Among the "foreign denominations" are numbered also the Jews, whose settlement in some parts of the Russian Empire is contemporaneous with, or even antedates, the appearance of the Russian people itself on the stage of history. In the Ipatievsky Chronicle, dating as far back as the middle of the twelfth century, the Jews are mentioned as old residents of Russia. In Poland they resided from time immemorial; since the eleventh century their presence in Poland is established by historical evidence. In the kingdom of the Chazars, which occupied the southeast territory of the present European Russia, the Jews were settled in large numbers as early as in the seventh century. It is therefore against all evidence to class them, as is done in some quarters, with the "foreign" elements of the population of the empire. As well might the descendants of the Norman conquerors be classed to-day among the foreign population of Great Britain.

So much is true, however, that there was no Jewish population within the boundaries of the Muscovite state. The federation of southwestern principalities which centred around the capital city of Kiev,—the cradle of the Russian nation,—had, through the vicissitudes of history, become incorporated in the Polish commonwealth, and it was only with the partition of Poland that the Russian Empire came into possession of the bulk of its Jewish population.

The old Muscovite attitude toward the Jews was expressed by Empress Elizabeth in 1743, when the Senate represented to her that the enforcement of the law directing the expulsion of Jewish merchants from Russian fairs affected injuriously the fiscal interest. To this the Empress rejoined, "From the enemies of Christ I desire no lucrative returns."

The Muscovite law which shut the door against the Jews could not be applied to new possessions thickly settled with Jews. But while the imperial government could not order the depopulation of the cities and towns in the newly acquired provinces, it "guarded the ancient foundations of the state" in so far as it excluded the Jews, as before, from the original Muscovite territory, merely leaving them where it had found them. Thus the "pale of settlement" was created, by that name the law describing the limited area within which the Jews were permitted to reside. The boundaries have undergone many changes, at first being widened, then again narrowed down. Whenever a province or a city, formerly within the pale, was excluded, thousands of Jewish settlers were ordered out of the forbidden territory. The latest expulsions took place during the reign of Alexander III.

The Jewish riots of 1881 and 1882 created a public sentiment in Russia extremely hostile to Jews, and the sentiment was given official expression in the "Provisional Rules" of May 3-15, 1881, which prohibited the Jews from settling and acquiring real estate outside of cities and towns of the pale of settlement. Though the law on the face of it had no retroactive power, yet in practice it resulted in the gradual expulsion of about one-fifth of the Jewish population from their places of residence. Many of these rural Jews were lessees of farms and flour mills, with leases that could not be renewed when their terms expired. Thus scores of tenants were forced to quit the land upon which they and their fathers had been born and raised. In 1889 the cities of Taganrog and Rostov on the Don were excluded from the pale. Such of the Jewish residents as were enrolled as burghers of those cities were not molested, but all those enrolled elsewhere and residing in Rostov or Taganrog on passports were ordered within six months to wind up their businesses and go. In 1891 the Jews of Moscow were similarly ordered to depart within not more than six months, a time considered by the government ample for the closing up of their business matters.

Step by step, the civil and political rights of the Jews were materially curtailed.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

Jews are practically debarred now from holding public office or positions in the civil service; only limited numbers of Jewish children are admitted to the public schools, and few private schools for Jews are licensed. Local authorities have gone to great lengths in widening the scope of the retroactive regulations beyond the limits originally contemplated by the central government. Whenever appeal has been taken to the Senate, the local authorities have invariably been reversed.¹ But appeals are slow and costly, and in most cases the rulings of the local authorities stand. More-

(¹) The Senate is a judicial body divided into several departments. The First Department, which has jurisdiction of all appeals from the rulings of the administration, has an honorable record as a strict upholder of the law and of the rights of citizens. The Criminal Cassation Department, which is a court of error in criminal cases, has, on the contrary, suited its interpretation of the law to the policies of the government. It is a familiar maxim among the legal profession in Russia that "there are no reversible errors for a Jew."

over the decisions of the Senate on appeal are not regarded by the administration as precedents, but merely as orders in particular cases. The Provincial Board of Bessarabia went so far as to disregard the decisions of the Senate even in those cases where its rulings were appealed from and reversed.

The Kishinyov massacre revealed to the outside world the fact that the representatives of government authority were capable of denying to Jews the protection of the law when lives and property and the honor of their women were attacked by a riotous mob. It is, perhaps, not as well known that the conduct of the authorities at Kishinyov was in no way exceptional. The commission, with Count Palen as chairman, appointed by the government to inquire into the causes of the frequent anti-Jewish riots during the reign of Alexander III., said in its report:

It is beyond any doubt that, in most cases where the riots assumed especially grave dimensions, their growth was caused by the inadequacy or weakness of the measures adopted by the police. When police supervision was made more efficient and the administration was made responsible for anti-Jewish outbreaks, the latter did not recur, or were nipped in the bud.

In a strictly centralized autocratic government, like that of Russia, local officers of the administration seek to anticipate the wishes of the central government; the moment the latter announced its intention to hold all officials responsible for laxity in dealing with anti-Jewish riots, rioting ceased. Apparently, prior to that announcement, there had been something in the attitude of the central government to create the belief among local authorities that they would not be held liable for inaction. In the light of earlier events the inaction of the Kishinyov authorities is traceable to the same cause, namely, the feeling that the government at St. Petersburg would hold the local authorities blameless.

That the policy of the government towards the Jews is dictated by religious motives is officially denied, and with certain qualifications the denial may be accepted. The college-bred class from among whom the officers of the government are selected are notoriously indifferent in matters of religion. The high dignitary in Tolstoi's "Resurrection" who vicariously represents the Czar as the head of the church, though without any religion himself, is not overdrawn. Like the aristocratic infidels in France before the Revolution, the Russian official of that type regards the established church as a part of the police machinery of the state. Tolerance towards Protestants and Mohammedans, persecution of Roman Catholics and Jews, are purely political matters.

In the discussion of the Jewish question, following the Kishinyov massacre, it was given out by the Russian Ambassador at Washington that the cause of the hatred against the Jew in Russia was "Jewish exploitation." Shirking the labor of the farmer, the Jew is said to be a natural born banker; as soon as he has accumulated two dollars he invests his capital by loaning it at usurious interest to his peasant neighbor. Hence the frequent anti-Jewish riots are outbreaks of the hatred of the debtor class against the creditor. The legal discrimination against the Jew is intended for the protection of the poor peasant against "Jewish exploitation."

The opinion is noteworthy in that it shows the unconscious effect of socialistic propaganda upon the official Russian mind. The term "exploitation" in a vituperative sense has come into the Russian vocabulary from the writings of the socialists. From the socialistic point of view labor is the sole creator of value; any income not produced by the labor of its recipient is in the last resort surplus value, the result of "exploitation" of labor by capital. In the crude "populist" interpretation of this theory by the disciples of Michael Bakounine, agricultural labor was substituted for labor in general. These ideas have permeated the whole Russian periodical press, and the government, while banishing the populists and socialists to Siberia, has itself adopted their views in dealing with "Jewish exploitation." The tendency found expression in the "Provisional Rules" of May 3-15, 1881, which resulted in the expulsion of Jews from the rural districts.

From the standpoint of Russian statecraft, the anti-Jewish policy was a signal success. It earned the approval of a portion of the populists; it turned the sentiment among the university students from radicalism to Judeophobia, thus causing division in the most turbulent portion of the educated classes. The most influential populist periodicals and newspapers, committed to the theory of equal rights, were reluctant to approve the policy of discrimination against the Jews, neither could they espouse the cause of the "exploiters" of the people; and so they maintained a dignified silence, though some publications of the same persuasion openly sided with the government on the Jewish question.

Within the last few years, however, a revulsion of sentiment has set in. The rapid spread of the social democratic and labor movement throughout Russia, especially among the Jewish workingmen, has created a strong public opinion opposed to religious or race discrimination. On the other hand, disaffection is beginning to spread from the cities to the rural districts. In the spring of 1902, as a result of bad crops, serious disturbances of an agrarian character broke out over a wide area of Southern Russia. Driven by starvation the peasants of several counties broke open the barns of the landlords and divided among themselves the grain stored there. In a few cases the buildings were demolished or burned down.

Precisely as the anti-Jewish riots of a generation ago followed close after the assassination of Alexander II., which marked the culmination of the revolutionary movement of those days, so did the Kishinyov massacre come very opportunely at a time when the socialistic agitation among all classes of the people had become a serious menace to the safety of the autocratic government. The anti-Semitic journal, Bessarabetz, which had on its editorial staff the vice-governor of Kishinyov, wrote immediately after the massacre that "it was the answer of the Christian people to the socialistic agitation of the Jews." In a few instances the local authorities, when re-requested by committees of Jewish citizens to take steps for the prevention of rumored recurrences of the anti-Jewish riots, demanded, as the condition of their giving protection to Jewish women and children, that leading citizens among the Jews should induce their co-religionists to refrain from taking part in revolutionary demonstrations. The effect of these official utterances, by arraying racial solidarity against political sympathies, has been to bring division into the midst of the Jews themselves. Russian journals published outside the dominions of the Russian censor have reported a few cases of Jewish socialist agitators having been delivered by their co-religionists into the hands of the police.

The massacre at Kishinyov must, on the other hand, have acted like a damper on many advocates of popular government in Russia. If the people are yet so low morally as to find a fiendish delight in inflicting torture upon defenceless women and babes, how can they be entrusted with the privilege of governing themselves?

That the effect of the Kishinyov massacre has been to strengthen the stability of the autocratic government, is taken by the Russian opposition of all shades of opinion as proof of connivance at the rioting on the part of the ministry of the interior. A friendly foreign public, having no grievance of its own against the Russian government, may give it the benefit of the doubt. Let us rather consider what steps have since been taken to prevent the recurrence of such outrages.

By order of the Emperor, governors and chiefs of police were reminded, through the Minister of the Interior, that "it was incumbent upon them, under their personal responsibility, to take all measures for preventing violence and pacifying the people, in order to remove all cause of apprehension among any portion of the people for their lives and property," and further, "that no organizations whatever for self-defence (among the Jews) could be tolerated." Where the governors and chiefs of police must be reminded by special order of the Emperor that it is their duty to prevent violence and preserve peace, the situation is certainly abnormal. Under such circumstances, to forbid organizing for self-defence, when life and property and honor are threatened, is at best to subordinate the safety of the Jewish people to the integrity of the Russian police state. The Minister of the Interior has merely reaffirmed a fundamental theory of Russian public law, that any military organization of citizens, for whatever purpose, is incompatible with autocratic government.

Still, the fact must not be overlooked that, although the motive of all legal discriminations against the Jews is political, it assumes the guise of religious intolerance. The test of a Jew, as defined by the law, is not racial, but religious.¹ A baptized Jew is no longer treated by the law as a Jew. Even so extreme an anti-Semite as the editor of the Bessarabetz, while warning the Jews to quit Russia within one year for their own good, proposes to them as an alternative that they "become Christians and our brethren" and stay at Kishinyov, presumably with the privilege of "exploiting" their brethren in Christ.

III.

The degree of tolerance accorded by the fundamental law to "foreign denominations" does not include the vast class of dissenters from the national church coming under the head of "heresies and schisms."

(¹) Decisions of the First Department of the Senate, 1889, No. 25.

The report of the Procurator of the Holy Synod for the years 1894 and 1895 estimated the membership of these sects at thirteen millions. Students of the religious movements among the Russian people place the number nearer twenty millions.

Reform tendencies in the Russian Church date as far back as the fifteenth century, which was marked by a widespread interest in religious and philosophical questions in the famous Hanse town of Novgorod and the city-republic of Pskov, then the centres of Russian civilization. The reduction of these republics to the condition of provinces of the Muscovite state put an end to that early movement for religious reform which, for a brief time, however, seemed to have conquered the conquerors.

About 1471, a learned Jew, Zacharias of Kiev, was brought to Novgorod among the attendants of the newly elected Prince Michael Olelkovich. Zacharias laid the foundation of the heresy of the Judaizing, a rationalist sect which very rapidly gained adherents among both clergy and laity. The Muscovite Grand Duke John III., on visiting Novgorod, called to his court two Novgorod priests identified with the new religious movement. They fervently applied themselves to preaching the new doctrine and gained many converts among the clergy and the courtiers. The Grand Duke himself was favorably inclined towards them and lent his influence to elevate one of the new teachers to the see of Metropolitan of Moscow. But the orthodox party was too strong for these early pioneers of reform, and soon regained its ascendancy. In 1504 the teachers of the Judaizing were tried for heresy, and sentenced, some to be burned at the stake, others to have their tongues cut out; many were imprisoned in convents or banished, and the incipient movement for religious reform was stopped.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

The ignorance of the clergy, as dense as that of the people, insured for generations to come the unity of the Orthodox Church against division bred by the spirit of inquiry. With the first beginnings of education among the clergy, its ritualism, impregnable in its adherence to tradition, was bound to crumble under its own weight. Through the ignorance of clerical scribes many errors kept creeping into the liturgy and prayer-books of the Russian church. A revision was attempted early in the seventeenth century under the direction of a learned Greek, who unfortunately was not familiar with the Slav language used in the church, whereas his assistants had no knowledge of Greek. The revision was as defective as the old books, and a commission was sent to the Orient, that fountain of tradition. A vast collection of ancient manuscripts was secured and brought to Moscow. Jealousy naturally sprang up between the revisers and the new commission. To settle the controversy, a church council was held at Moscow in 1654, presided over by the Russian Patriarch, Nikon, and attended by the Patriarchs of Antioch and Servia, the changes recommended by the commission being approved in accord with the ritual adopted in the Oriental churches. This decision was the signal for a great schism. A large faction among the clergy refused to accept the innovations and remained faithful to the "old ritual." Persecution of the opposition widened the breach. The Orthodox Church was denounced as "the nest of Antichrist," and the Czar was bitterly arraigned for having allied himself to the heretics and persecutors of the true orthodoxy.

Persecution of the "schismatics" grew in severity, and in 1681 their leader, Protopope Avvacum, with a number of his disciples, was burned at the stake. Unlike the movement of the Judaizing, the great schism of the old ritualists could not be killed with its leaders, for it drew its strength from a deep-seated discontent in church and state. The Patriarch Nikon was a representative of that type of man who, in another environment, might have been a military dictator, like Napoleon, a political boss, or a captain of industry. His domineering character and centralizing tendencies antagonized many among the lower clergy, and the "old ritual" merely proved a convenient issue to bring together all those who instinctively inclined towards a democratic organization of the church.

The state having espoused the cause of the dominant church, drew upon itself the enmity of the leaders of the schism. Opposition to the church developed into opposition to the state; the "old ritualist" clergy became the natural leaders of all the discontented in the realm. The reforms of

Peter the Great taxed all the resources of the nation. The introduction of a standing army; the extension of serfdom to provide laborers for state mines, mills, and factories; stringent anti-vagrancy laws which affected the numerous class of fugitive serfs,—these and many other measures of the new fiscal policy bred discontent among the common people. On the other hand, Peter the Great, finding the way of reform blocked by the conservatism of the people, naturally distrusted them. Discarding the Assembly of the Commons and the Council of the Boyars, or house of lords, he was the first Russian Czar to rule as an autocrat. While the Commons had had, during the Muscovite period, merely a consultative voice, and it was optional with the Czar to call the Commons together, custom had demanded that the voice of the Commons be heard on all matters of public importance. Whenever a new code of laws was to be enacted, the Czar invariably sought their advice.

Peter the Great, by breaking with this ancient custom, antagonized all classes of the people. The old ritualists earnestly believed him to be the Antichrist, and in all revolts against his reforms were the moving spirits. The original controversy over Hallelujah, or the proper spelling of the name of Christ (whether "Jesus" or "Isus") thus developed into a democratic, religious, and political movement.

Very early in its history the great schism split into two branches over the question of priesthood. Since the patriarch and the bishops had abandoned the true faith and joined the "Nikonian heresy," who was to ordain new priests? The people of the sparsely settled extreme North, who, owing to geographical situation had been accustomed to live without priests, came to the conclusion that henceforth there could be no priesthood in the true church. Without a priest to administer the sacraments there could be no sacraments, and thus, proceeding from a purely ritual controversy, the "Priestless," as they were called, arrived ultimately at a rationalistic conception of religion. These, again, maintaining the right of free interpretation of the Scriptures, soon split up into a number of rationalistic sects. The other, more conservative branch of the schism, recognizing priesthood, preserved its unity, and after a long struggle forced the state to grant them a degree of tolerance.

Under the law of 1685 the schismatics were liable to be burned at the stake and their property was subject to confiscation; those harboring them were liable to be punished by the knout and banished. Driven by persecution the dissenters fled to the outskirts of the empire, a powerful factor in Russian territorial expansion. The spirit of martyrdom was so strong in them that not infrequently, when caught by the authorities, they would burn themselves alive rather than surrender. Within the first five years after the enactment of the law of 1685 as many as twenty thousand persons sacrificed themselves in this way. In the eighteenth century on one occasion more than two thousand persons resorted to this mode of self-destruction. Gradually, however, a modus vivendi was established; the officers of the government soon recognized the possibilities of the laws against the schism and made them a source of handsome revenue for themselves, in consideration of which immunity was granted to the dissenters.

After a century of persecution the imperial government realized the fact that the "schism" had come to stay. By the ukase of Peter III., in 1762, the privileges accorded to foreign denominations were extended to the native sects. Catherine II., it is true, born a Protestant princess and converted to orthodoxy in order to marry the Russian heir to the throne, showed her zeal by prohibiting the construction of old ritualistic churches. The old ritualists retaliated by taking an active part in the peasant rebellion led by Poogatchov, who, under the assumed name of Peter III., for nearly a year held half the empire subject. Persecutions were renewed during the short reign of the insane Paul I. His successor, Alexander I., educated by Laharpe in the principles of French liberalism, relaxed the severity of the law by granting the dissenters the privilege of private worship; all public manifestations of worship, however, remaining under the ban, as before.

The political reaction which set in during the latter part of the reign of Alexander I., brought with it a recrudescence of the old-time intolerance. Under the act of 1824,

backsliders from among the "converted" old ritualists were to be drafted into the army, and women were to be banished to Siberia. As the alleged "conversions" were never voluntary, the act of 1824 was virtually a return to the seventeenth-century policy. Under Nicholas I. a systematic campaign of persecution of old ritualist worship was inaugurated. Count Protasov, the Procurator of the Holy Synod, in his report to the Czar in 1842, divided the Russian sects into two classes—the "more harmful" and the "less harmful." The former class included all "Priestless" sects, whose danger was manifested in their democratic spirit. He recommended that the "more harmful" sects should be dealt with by the penal code, whereas the "less harmful" should be discouraged by a system of civil and political disabilities. The recommendations were approved by the Czar. The old ritualists were debarred practically from holding public office by the provision of the law requiring them to take the oath of office in accordance with the orthodox rite. They were denied admission to high schools and universities. Their marriages were not recognized by the law and their children were treated as illegitimate. They were disqualified from testifying in civil actions against members of the Orthodox Church. In certain provinces they were prohibited from buying real estate. Many of them were forbidden to leave their domiciles. Their worship was materially interfered with. The erection of new prayer-houses or the repairing of old ones was prohibited; those which became dilapidated were to be condemned and shut up by the authorities, while the use of dwellings for prayer-rooms was likewise prohibited. And, though thus treated as an element of public danger at home, they were nevertheless not permitted to emigrate from Russia.

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

Alexander II., the Reformer, continued the policy of his father. All restrictive laws enacted under Nicholas I. were included in the "Revised Statutes" of 1857, published by the authority of the new Czar. The policy of the temporal and spiritual powers was directed, in official phraseology, towards "the eradication of schismatic errors among the people." As a concession to the spirit of the times, those born of dissenter parents were not to be molested, but all proselyting was forbidden. One important reform was enacted late in the reign of Alexander II., by the law of 1874, which introduced the institution of civil marriage among the old ritualists. This is an exception from the general law which regards marriage as a sacrament whose legality is conditioned upon its celebration by competent spiritual authority. The Russian state will not recognize the "schism" as a Christian church, hence the institution of civil marriage. In all other respects the condition of the dissenters throughout the "liberal" reign of Alexander II. remained the same as under the iron rule of his father.

IV.

Only in 1883 did a limited degree of tolerance come to be accorded to the dissenters. By the act of May 3, 1883, all their civil and political disabilities were removed. They were also permitted to hold public worship, provided, however, that their prayer-houses should not have the outward appearance of churches; they must have no crosses or bells to distinguish them.

On the face of it the new law would seem to extend to the dissenters the same privileges as those enjoyed by the Protestant denominations. This tolerance, however, is practically nullified by the law, still remaining in full force, which punishes apostasy from the Orthodox Church and the spreading of "heresies and schisms."¹ Only those of the dissenters who were born of dissenter parents enjoy the immunity from persecution granted by the act of 1883. But the bulk of the membership of the recent sects, for example, the Stundists or Baptists, are "apostates" from the Orthodox Church. Under Section 190 of the Penal Code, those of them who bring up their children in their new faith are liable to imprisonment for a term of not less than eight months, or more than sixteen months. Moreover, "their children are entrusted to the care of relatives of the orthodox confession, or, in the absence of such, to the care of guardians, likewise of the orthodox faith, who are appointed for the purpose by the government."

Nor is this a dead letter. The most conspicuous case of the law's being applied in all its severity was that of Prince Hilkoﬀ, a relative of the present minister of transportation, and a follower of Tolstoi. The story of the separation of his children from their parents a few years ago was told to the press of the world by the heartbroken mother. There are many such mothers among the Russian peasantry.

(¹) Penal Code, Sections 189 and 196.

Under the conditions of peasant life indeed no dissenter can escape the charge of seeking to make converts among members of the Orthodox Church. The writer once witnessed the trial of a case which may be taken as typical. The prisoner himself was a Stundist, but his son married an orthodox girl, and, as is customary among Russian peasants, took her into his father's house to live. At times the Stundists of the village would meet for the reading of the Bible at the old man's home. An average peasant house consists of a kitchen and one sitting-room, so it was quite inevitable that the daughter-in-law should be present at the Stundist meetings. This was enough to make out a complete case of preaching an heretical doctrine to a member of the Orthodox Church. The old man was found guilty and sentenced to forfeiture of all civil rights ("civil death") and banished to the Transcaucasian region.

The effect of this policy can be easily imagined. Persecution has not prevented the spread of religious dissent, but has merely brought about a sort of natural selection, by which only the seekers after truth, those who are ready to suffer for the sake of truth, have joined the new religious sects. The result has been a higher moral tone among the "sectarians" than is usual among the peasantry, complete absence of drunkenness and dissipation, a spirit of mutual helpfulness and co-operation, and hand in hand with this moral and social regeneration an improvement of the eco-conomic condition of the dissenter peasants. This object lesson has been a more potent factor in attracting new converts than mere preaching could be.

The most "dangerous" of all the modern sects is the Shtoonda (German "Stunde") which first made its appearance in Southern Russia soon after the emancipation of the peasants (1861) and owes its origin to the influence of German colonists. Its rapid spread was due to the political and economic conditions of the time, which made the more intelligent portion of the peasantry susceptible to influences of an idealistic nature.

The peasant reform of Alexander II., far from satisfying the peasantry, became the cause of widespread discontent among them. Owing to certain historical causes the peasant's ideal of "freedom" included the division of the land among the peasantry.

The peasantry of the nineteenth century

continued to live amidst the conditions of the seventeenth century, when the title to all lands was vested in the sovereign and the nobility held their estates merely for public services, subject to forfeiture at the pleasure of the Czar; on the other hand, the peasants were adscripts to the land likewise for the needs of the state. Emancipation from personal dependence upon the nobleman was to the peasant mind merely a reform of the public service; the peasant was to serve the Czar directly, instead of indirectly through a master. The nobleman was to go to the city and enter the civil service or the army. The reform of Alexander II. merely abolished the personal power of the nobleman over the peasant; the peasant was given the alternative of either accepting an allotment of land at an exorbitant price, or paying a tribute to or performing labor as before for the master. This unsettled condition of "temporary servitude," as it was officially termed, continued throughout the reign of the "Czar-Liberator," and applied to fully one-half of the former serfs.

The whole scheme was so radically at variance with the peasant's conception of "freedom" that he refused to accept it as genuine. It seemed to him a huge conspiracy of the landed and office-holding nobility against the Czar and the people. The carrying out of the reform was naturally attended with serious disturbances throughout the empire, but the opposition of the peasants was crushed by military force. Broken in spirit, with their ideas of truth and justice badly shattered, they were given hope in this hour of despair by the teachers of the new Christianity. They had heard the Bible read in a foreign, unintelligible tongue in the Orthodox Church, as merely a part of the ritual. The Bible read and explained to them by the Stundist teachers was a living truth, full of meaning, going to their own minds and hearts.

The Stundist movement rapidly spread among the peasantry, winning village after village from the Orthodox Church. The clergy were aroused; poorly paid by the state and burdened with large families, they depended upon the fees paid by their parishioners for religious services, and the new religious movement threatened to deprive them of their livelihood. A vigorous campaign of persecution followed, which has not been relaxed up to the present day.

Persecution by the government turned the attention of the Stundists to political questions. The spread of education has made them familiar with the political and social ideals current among the upper classes. The work of Count Tolstoi has served as a connecting link between the progressive elements of the common people and the reformers and radicals of the "intelliguentzia," or the cultured classes. The two million Stundists to-day are the strongest social group working for democracy in Russia.

The Czar's manifesto proclaiming the urgent need of religious tolerance is a recognition of the recent political aspect of the religious movement among the common people. Born of political necessity, religious tolerance will, in conformity with precedent, extend as far as the exigencies of the situation justify. The native dissenters will very likely be restored to the privileges which were granted to them one hundred and forty-one years ago by the ukase of Peter III., putting them on a footing with "foreign denominations." All indications, however, are to the effect that the Czar's manifesto on "religious tolerance" must be construed in the narrow sense of the fundamental Russian laws.

Two acts affecting the civil rights of the

RELIGIOUS SECTS IN RUSSIA

Jews have indeed been passed since the promulgation of the manifesto. One extends the Ghetto to one hundred and one rural settlements from which the Jews have heretofore been excluded. Upon closer scrutiny, however, it appears that these settlements are either suburbs of cities that have expanded far beyond their corporate limits, or villages that have developed into industrial towns, though still retaining their village organization, their incorporation being only a question of time. There is, consequently, no abandonment of the principle that the Jews must be confined to urban settlements. The principle has received some further extension through the suspension of the law permitting certain privileged classes of Jews, such as university graduates, merchants in high standing, etc., to acquire farming property outside of the pale of settlement, but it has been discovered, runs the edict, that the Jews have availed themselves of the privilege to a considerable degree, and therefore it has been deemed wise to suspend it until further notice.
